At Rest.

Shall I lie down to sleep, and see no more
The splendid affluence of earth and sky;
The proud procession of the stars go by;
The white moon sway the sea and woo the shore;
The morning lark to the far heavens soar;
The nightingale to the soft dusk draw nigh;
The summer roses bud, and bloom and die;
Will life and life's delight for me be o'er?

Nay! I shall be in my low, silent home,
Of all earth's gracious ministries aware;
Glad with the gladness of the risen day;
Or gently sad with sadness of the gloam,
Yet done with striving and foreclosed of care—
"At rest—at rest!"—what better thing to say.

Written for the PALMER JOURNAL.

LOCAL REMINISCENCES OF PALMER.

BY REV. MOSES K. CROSS.

"There is something in the place where we were born that holds us always by the heart strings," says Lucy Larcom; and the same is true of the place where we began our wedded life and our life work. Palmer Center was not a specially inviting place when I first went there, 55 years ago. A dozen or less plain cottages, one small store, a hotel, a schoolhouse and a church, nestled in the valley, towards which all the roads converged from different parts of the town. At the foot of a steep hill on a straight turnpike road just out of the village stood the parsonage, with a large barn directly opposite in front of it. A very uninviting place, surely, for a person of romantic and poetic tastes, who had become familiar with the beautiful scenery at Amherst College and Andover Seminary. To this quiet, retired place a young man, fresh from his theological studies, was invited as a pastor, and hither brought his young bride in the blooming month of May, 1842.

But the people were cordial and social, and the call was earnest and almost unanimous, which was the chief inducement to accept the position. As a candidate he had preached a somewhat old-school sermon on depravity,—which was mainly a condensation of Dr. Leonard Wood's lectures on the subject,—to which some took exceptions as implying, in their view, (according to the old Calvinistic notion) that only certain "elect infants" were saved, and the rest lost,—and there was likely to be a divided vote unless some explanatory words were spoken.

To clear himself from any such Calvinistic notions, whatever the result might be as to the "call," the candidate laid aside all theological lectures and treatises and gave the reins to Christian consciousness, philosophy, poetry and human nature, in a brand-new discourse on the moral character of infants, which had the effect to clear the atmosphere of all suspicion of heresy, on that subject, at least.

But I took my pen to write of what I found of interest in the prosaic environment at Palmer Center half a century ago. I discovered in my walks some lofty hills or mountains twenty miles away, which for a time I could not definitely locate. And mountains from my childhood had always been "things of beauty" and "a joy forever." I soon learned that these mountains were no other than the backs of the Holyoke range, with whose more graceful fronts I had been as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free.

Why

Do people buy Hood's Sarsaparilla in preference to any other,—in fact almost to the exclusion of all others?

Because

They know from actual use that Hood's is the best, i. e., it cures when others fail. Hood's Sarsaparilla is still made under the personal supervision of the educated pharmacists who originated it.

The question of best is just as positively decided in favor of Hood's as the question of comparative sales.

Another thing: Every advertisement of Hood's Sarsaparilla is true, is honest.

DROP AND DIPPER PUZZLE

It looks Strange but it is True.

A Case in Every-day Life Where a Single Drop Weighs More Than a Whole Dipperful.

IT looks like a puzzle, and it is a puzzle until you try it yourself. That solves it. Every man can solve it. Every woman can solve it. On one side of the scales is a single drop. On the other side is a dipperful. Yet the drop carries the most weight. Why is it, and how is it? Here is the explanation.

The one drop is a drop of Puritana. The dipperful is a dipperful of so-called blood purifier, nerve tonic, or other palate-tickling concoction. The one drop of Puritana is real medicine—it cures. The dipperful is anything, everything, and nothing, when it comes right down to a real cure.

Puritana is the prize formula of Prof. Dixi Crosby, who was for thirty-two years at the head of Dartmouth Medical College. It strikes at the root of 92 per cent. of human suffering, and brings new strength, new health, new life through the power producer of the system. Puritana makes the heart right, lungs right, liver right, blood right, kidneys right, nerves right, and health right, because it makes the stomach right. To any man, woman, or child who will take it as directed, Puritana will practically give a new stomach. That is why hundreds and thousands of people have proved that it cures from head to foot.

J. F. Scott, for years a prominent contractor and builder in Concord, N. H., says:

"I have used Puritana for torpid liver, indigestion, and a species of dyspepsia, and it has given me such relief that I felt made over new. For these troubles I would rather have one bottle of Puritana than a barrel of any other medicine."

She can eat anything now, but her life was hanging in the balance, when her stomach could not digest the simplest food. Mrs. Belle W. Cale, of Charlestown, Mass., tried country air and seven doctors in vain, but Puritana gave her a new stomach and a new lease of life.

Mrs. Henry W. Craigue, of Concord, N. H., was ill for years. She had no appetite, no strength, no ambition. Her life was one constant round of misery and suffering. Puritana gave her an appetite and rugged strength. It made a new woman of her.

No chance, was what the doctor said about George H. Dunning, of Faneuil Hall Market, Boston. He had nervous prostration, had no appetite, could not sleep, could not walk alone. Puritana made him over new from head to foot. It gave him sleep, appetite, and strength.

After trying many doctors, hospitals, and medicines in vain, Mrs. J. S. Daly, of Cambridge, Mass., had also abandoned hope, when Puritana was brought to her relief. It gave her strength and health, pure, rich blood, vigorous digestion, and raised her from the sick bed to the full vigor of happy womanhood.

Yes, one drop of Puritana will bring more real relief, more real cure, more real strength, more real nerve force, more real power and vital energy, more real "life-is-worth-living," than a dipperful, a bucketful, a barrelful of so-called tonics, blood cures, nerve foods, pills, and doubtful preparations from unknown sources, that is the reason why Puritana is the most economical medicine as well as the most effective in the world.

familiar at Amherst. It was a great delight in my new home thus to be able to transport myself to the scenes of other days by glancing away to the peaks of Holyoke and Nonottuck, which I had so often gazed upon from "College Hill, and roamed over alone or with company in college days.

Another charming elevation near at hand, though difficult of ascent, early arrested my attention. I know not if it ever had a name, but it is worthy of one, and would have had one if Wordsworth had lived near it. From its summit I could look down on one side upon the Ware river, gliding peacefully along towards Thorndike, and on the other side upon the little village and the church, which was to be the scene of my labor for years to come.

From my study window in the parsonage a pretty little mountain a mile away was always before me, covered to the summit with trees, and bearing the unpoetic name of "Dumplin Hill." I never climbed it, but it was always there, and always the same, and I often climbed it in imagination. Another attractive spot was a little piece of woods on the road to Ware, not more than half a mile away, now probably divested of the trees, like Dumplin Hill; but then a retired nook to which I often repaired, in summer and winter, for a quiet hour with nature and my own soul. The large branching hemlocks with their perennial fragrance and greenness, bending to the ground in winter with a burden of snow, were invested with a sacredness that could not be felt in the open field or on the public road. Some notes made in those days in my private journal may, perhaps, properly be published now, since most of those then living have passed beyond the river. They were written, of course, without a thought of their ever being published, simply for my own pleasure and profit; but convey impressions of "lang syne" not wholly devoid of interest at the present day:

"July 6, 1842. Sunset Reflections. It is long since I had so pleasant a season of sunset reflection as on this evening. I had been to visit a sick woman in a remote part of the town and in lowly circumstances. I stood on an elevated place on the Brimfield road and gazed with calm and deep delight on the scene around me, and with still deeper emotions reverting to scenes that are past. The calm clouds in the distant horizon, the setting sun, the wooded hills and verdant groves, the grey church spire rising above the scattering pines and surrounding hills, with here and there a white house dotting the landscape, presented a scene of inspiring power and led me to think with earnestness of the subject I had in view for the following Sabbath—The Life to Come."

"July 25, 1842. A Morning Walk. Rambled in the morning to the old paths, which I used to tread before my marriage, upon the mountain. It was richly verdant and greatly changed since I last visited it. I reverted with serious and pensive interest to the past, remembering that I had been a pastor six months and been married three months. As I sat upon the rock on the summit of the hill, thinking of my ways, I saw much to lament both in my pastoral and domestic life, and much to call forth my fervent gratitude."

"Sept. 24, 1854. Again on the mountain, where I enjoyed a season of rich, lucid and vigorous reflection, also of cheerful and hopeful anticipation." * * *

But few can ever have the privilege of living among the lakes and mountains of Northern England, and fewer still have the genius of Wordsworth to give them fame, but many of us can find, as Wordsworth did, in the simple scenes of nature and common life much that is elevating and satisfying:

Nor deem that localized romance
Plays false with our affections,
Unsanctifies our tears—made sport
For fanciful dejections.
Ah, no! the visions of the past
Sustain the heart in feeling
Life as she is—our changeful life,
With friends and kindred dealing.

LEGAL PLEA FOR HER HAND.

The judge's daughter was perturbed.

"Papa," she said, knitting her pretty brow, "I am in doubt as to whether I have kept to the proper form of procedure. In law one can err in so many little technicalities that I am ever fearful. Now, last evening George—"

The judge looked at her so sharply over his glasses that she involuntarily paused.

"I thought you had sent him about his business," he said.

"I did hand down an adverse decision," she answered, "and he declared that he would appeal. However, I convinced him that I was the court of last resort in a case like that, and that no appeal would lie from my decision."

"Possibly the court was assuming a little more power than rightfully belongs to it," said the judge, thoughtfully; "but let that pass. What did he do then?"

"He filed a petition for a rehearing."

"The usual course," said the judge, "but it is usually nothing but a mere formality."

"So I thought," returned the girl, "and I was prepared to deny it without argument; but the facts set forth in his petition were sufficient to make me hesitate and wonder whether his case had really been properly presented at the first trial."

"Upon what grounds did he make the application?" asked the judge, scowling.

"Well," she replied, blushing a little, "you see, he proposed by letter, and his contention was that the case was of that peculiar character that cannot be properly presented by briefs, but demands oral arguments. The fact that the latter had been omitted, he held, should be held to be an error, and the point was such a novel one that I consented to let him argue it. Then his argument was so forceful that I granted his petition, and consented to hear the whole case again. Do you think—"

"I think," said the judge, "that the court favors the plaintiff."

HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES.

Address to the Class—Class Day Exercises—Reception to Class—Etc.

The above is a picture of the senior class of the Palmer high school, which is to be graduated this evening. Four years ago this class, then numbering 26, entered the high school. Since that time some have dropped out, so that there are fifteen who have completed the course. Their names are: Alice M. Armstrong, Fannie L. Barnes, Ella Bray, Lula E. Dillon, Ethel H. Ely, Helen Converse, Phebe D. Hastings, Ola M. Northrop, Walter H. Brown, Charles R. LeGro, William T. Sargent, John F. Roche, Jeremiah F Sugrue, Charles L. O'Connor, Ernest E. Hobson. All through the course the class has done good work and maintained a high standing. They have set a good example to their schoolmates, in that they have always been friendly to one another; probably no class was ever graduated from the high school in which there existed a more kindly and friendly spirit. The class possesses much mental ability, and there are ten who expect to enter into higher institutions of learning, though all cannot go this coming school year; two or three are as yet undecided. This certainly is a good record. Those who have a knowledge of the latent power which this class possesses, and those who saw the fine appearance which the class made at the class day exercises Wednesday evening, fell justified in saying that in the future places of honor and trust will be acceptably filled by them.

The exercises of graduation week at the Palmer high school commenced last Sunday evening, when the class attended the Baptist church to listen to an address by the pastor, Rev. C. R. Minard. The audience room was packed to the doors, all the Protestant churches of the town suspending their evening service for the event. The church was prettily decorated with the national colors and flowers, and the programme of the evening was materially added to by the singing of the quartette composed of Mrs. A. D. Norcross of Monson, Mrs. Rufus Flynt of Palmer, C. F. Orcutt of Monson and Mr. Mason of Worcester. The exercises commenced with a duet by Mrs. Norcross and Mrs. Flynt; Rev. H. F. Moulton made the opening prayer, Rev. F. E. Jenkins led the responsive reading, Mr. Moulton read the Scripture lesson, and Rev. G. S. Butler of Three Rivers offered prayer.

Mr. Minard's address was full of interest. The speaker's topic was, "The educational ideal," and the text, Eph. 4:13—"A full-grown man." After showing how the topic was drawn from the text the following proposition was made: "The proper ideal of all education is to produce the full-grown individual."

Those methods which conserve this end are right, all others are vicious and inadequate. This ideal requires the fullest development of the body. It is an evidence of progress that men have come to regard the body as the legitimate means for glorifying God. The ascetics who lived in the early centuries of the Christian era sought to destroy the body; the Epicureans defied it. But today, through a better understanding of Scripture teaching concerning the body, the present practical Christian civilization has been produced. Educational methods are recognizing the worth of the body. Manual and industrial training are meeting with increased favor; the eye and ear are being trained for the better appreciation of beauty by the attention given to drawing and music.

The mind must also be developed. This has always been the chief factor of education, but these facts with which the mind has been stored have not always served their rightful purpose. If a knowledge of these facts does not lead on to recognize God in all, then has such training failed of its highest mission. All education should inspire with hope for the future, and although history may appear to be cyclical in its movements, yet it has been substantially progressive. Mental training should always issue in hopefulness.

In addition to being physical and mental, man is always an ethical being. All proper training should make it continually easier for man to distinguish right from wrong. Education should make the divine ought to be, absolute sovereign. If desire and duty ever come in conflict, desire wins at the price of the soul.

Man has also a spiritual department in his make-up. To this the Lord Jesus Christ ministered preeminently, and no man is "full-grown" until this part of him is fully developed. The public schools can do good service in respect to the physical, mental and moral sphere, but there exists a difference of opinion in reference to their duty to the spiritual. They have in the past been used for religious training; it is possible to make that a part of their work now. But present conditions in the religious world do not make it wise to require it. But on the other hand it is altogether foreign to the spirit of American civilization to make our schools practically atheistic. In a nation founded upon God, right and the Bible such a movement is doomed to utter defeat. The Christian home and the church are the best means to be used for spiritual training, and these, with God's blessing, are sufficient.

A proper and proportionate development in these four departments of your being will reveal to you that the individual and society are not antagonistic, but mutually helpful factors in your life. The ends to be secured from such broad training are: "First, providence; the power to forecast the probable issue of events and to adjust yourselves to the new problems that meet you. Secondly, patriotism; the educated man is the true patriot because the wisest. He has the power, if he will, to rise above sectional strife and solve the national problems from the view-point of the nation. Thirdly, piety; the greatest men of history have been Christians, and no man is fully developed until he has faith in God and in the final victory of truth and right.

The class day exercises were held on the high school lawn Wednesday evening at 6:30, and were attended by a large audience from all parts of the village. The class sat on an elevated platform near the entrance of the building; in a window over their heads was "96" in white against a background of oak leaves. Settees were provided on the lawn for the audience. The programme was carried out as announced: Welcome by the class president, Walter H. Brown; class history, Miss Dillon; class sermon, Ernest E. Hobson; class statistics, Miss Hastings, class prophecy, written by Miss Bray and Miss Northrop, read by Miss Northrop; quotations, written by Miss Barnes and Miss Armstrong, read by Miss Armstrong; class will, C. R. LeGro; the class song was by Miss Ely:

Months and years have glided past us
Since we entered High School halls;
But at last that work is finished,
And the beck'ning future calls.
We have had our little trials,
We have had our scoldings just;
But to-night they're all behind us
And forgotten, let us trust.

Teachers, we shall ne'er forget you
When we go forth from your care;
While we strive for higher honors,
In our mem'ries you will share.
Schoolmates, we shall miss your voices,
We shall miss your faces bright,
But our motto urges forward
And we say farewell, to-night.

Forward, forward, ever forward,
With a purpose strong and true,
With the thought, there's work before us,
Work for hand and brain to do.
Idling never, working ever,
Onward, upward, we must strive;
Stagnant pools have little value,
Running streams the shuttles drive.

Let us go forth to the future
With a courage naught can shake,
With an aim for high endeavor,
Careful what the mark we make.
We must learn to conquer sorrow,
Self deny for noble deeds.
Part we must, life's work to finish,
Going where the Planner leads.

The exercises were decidedly interesting, and much enjoyed by the audience.

At 8 o'clock the class adjourned to the Converse House, to accept the invitation of Landlord Pierce. Here a short entertainment was given, consisting of readings by Mrs. Ida Belle Houston of Holyoke, and piano and banjo music by Misses Annie and Carrie Fish of Palmer, after which refreshments were served. A social time followed until about 10 o'clock, when the class departed, after singing the following, written by Miss Ely, to the tune of "National Praise:"

Landlord Pierce, we rise to thank you
For your gen'rous, kind invite,
For your pleasant, hearty greeting
As we gathered here to-night.
For your bountiful collation
Spread for us with so much care,
And the cordial, wholesome treatment
That has met us everywhere.

It has been a happy ending
Of class day of '96,
And will always be remembered
Long as life's clock for us ticks.
May you have a kindly schooling
Till class day which comes to all.
Then be given the invitation,
Welcome to heaven's banquet hall.

The graduating exercises will be held in the opera house this evening at 8, with this programme:

Music.
Address, "Influence."
President Elmer H. Capen, of Tufts College.
Music.
Class Song.
Presentation of Diplomas.
Rev. H. F. Moulton.
America.

Immediately after the exercises a reception will be given by the class to invited guests. The Palmer orchestra will furnish music for dancing, and light refreshments will be served.

CALIFORNIA'S GIANT REDWOODS.

Lying within the fog belt on the west side of the coast range, never farther than 20 miles from the coast, the gigantic redwoods breast the gales of the Pacific as though in derision of their more gigantic brethren, the Sequoia gigantea, who choose the warm breezes and genial sunshine of the western Sierra foothills in the interior. Three hundred feet in hight and 8 to 17 feet in diameter, they present an imposing mark not only for the tourist but for the lumberman. Like the grizzly, the buffalo and the North American Indian, the "big trees" are rapidly and surely dying out before the march of civilization, and it will not be many years before such a grove as the one at Guerneville will be all that is left to show the world of what the soil of California is capable. To-day the bulk of the remaining redwood forests is in two counties, Mendocino and Humboldt, where the annual rainfall is in keeping with the size of the trees—between four and five feet. Since 1856 the commercial value of these trees has been steadily growing, and in spite of the protests of the lovers of nature the demand has been met with a ready supply. A wood that will not rot, is hard to burn, easy to work up, of a rich mahogony color, and not difficulty to procure, holds out too many inviting inducements to expect any mercy from the human race. Redwoods have been found prostrate in perfectly good condition for lumber over and around which another redwood had grown that is between 500 and 600 years old. In clearing the ground after the lumber has been taken off, the roots have to be cut and dug out, for they will not burn on account of the amount of water they absorb. Fires which are almost an annual occurrence in the spruce and pine forests stop on the borders of the redwood groves. The absorbent nature of the lumber and the absence of resin and pitch make it of the highest value in building in case of fire. A redwood fire will die out in a gale of wind. Added to these virtues are the facts that it will not warp, is impervious to the effects of fresh water, and sustains a high polish. It is little wonder that only state laws or personal philanthropy can preserve these giants from total extinction.—Rounsevelle Wildman, in Overland Monthly.

SAW HIMSELF FOR THE FIRST TIME.—An old New Hampshire peasant farmer came to town to buy a hat, and was requested to look in the glass and see if the hat suited his taste. The customer stood before the glass as though fascinated by his reflected image. Presently he slowly inquired: "Well—is—that—me?" "Of course it is, guv'nor," was the shopman's reply. "Why, don't you know yourself?" "I be 60 years old," said the ancient, after another pause, "and I dunno as ever I see my face afore!" And when, his purchase completed, he turned to depart, he walked up to the looking-glass again, saying: "I'll just take one more look at mesel', for I dunno as ever I shall ha' the chance again."

SMOKING IN HAVANA.

A Havana man does not smoke in church. It is about the only place where he does not smoke. He smokes in the street cars, he smokes at the public dining table. The presence of woman is not considered at all. When coffee is brought on the table, the Spaniard or Cuban lights his cigar and begins to send up clouds of smoke. He never even thinks of saying to the ladies, "By your leave," for the custom of the country is to smoke everywhere. On the railway trains there is no smoking compartments, for a man is privileged—and in fact, expected—to smoke everywhere. If he is not smoking, his neighbor will offer him a cigaret. The driver of your coach will smoke, and very likely offer your a cheroot. At the opera the men will walk and smoke between the acts in the spaces behind the boxes and balconies. You will see finely-dressed, seemingly well-bred men, with ladies in full evening toilet, entering the theater and smoking as they go. You never see a pipe in Cuba. It is the country of the cigar and cigaret. One of the odd sights to the stranger is that afforded by the negro women, who smoke big, long and black cigars in the street. It was here that the smoking habit, which has spread around the world, had its start. In every house or office-building, the porter, who sits in the entresol, is engaged all day long in rolling cigarets. He has a little table in front of him, where the tobacco and paper are spread out, and he is constantly at work. In this way the porter adds to his income. When the Cuban is not smoking cigars he is smoking cigarets.—New York Home Journal.

PERFECTLY COMPETENT FENCE.

"You say you had that land all fenced before the defendant settled upon it?"

An attorney in a government land case was cross-examining a homesteader.

"Yes, I did."

"Was that fence horse-proof?"

"Yes, it was."

"Was it bull close?"

"Yes."

"And pig tight?"

"Yes."

"What was it made of?"

"Well—er—I can't say."

I noticed that the witness hesitated, floundered for the first time, and the attorney observed, too.

"Was it a rail fence?"

"No."

"Brush fence?"

"No."

"Picket fence?"

"No."

"Board fence?"

"No."

"Wire fence?"

"No; I don't know what it was made of; but it kept everything out," declared the witness, who had become desperate.

"Tell me what that fence was," persisted the attorney.

"Well, it was a man with a shotgun."—San Francisco Post.

A RAPIDLY MADE COAT.

Manufacturers are always pleased to turn out the products of their establishments in less than the average time, and many have made records to which they point with pride. In the issue of the Round Table for December 10 a short article was published on making a coat in 13½ hours, from shearing the sheep to putting the finished garment on the man's back. This was done at Greenham mills in England in 1811. Mrs. James Lyon of Bath, N. Y., writes that a similar feat took place in that town in 1816, and was accomplished in less than nine hours by one George McCluer, who asserted that it could be done in 10 hours. The record of each step of the work still exists, with the exception of the shearing. The wool was colored in 35 minutes; carded, spun and woven in two hours and 25 minutes; fulled, warped and dyed in one hour and 51 minutes; carried to the tailor in four minutes, and was turned into the finished coat by him and his journeymen in three hours and 49 minutes. The shears used in the work are still preserved, and can be seen at the Steuben agricultural society's fair grounds at Bath.

This feat at the time doubtless attracted as much attention as a record-breaking railroad train or steamship does to-day. It is probable that many of our present manufacturers make such trials for their own edification, which if described would prove interesting.—Harper's Round Table.

THAT FOLDING BED.

An old, gray-whiskered man, who had lived all his life on a small farm near Batavia, stopped at the hotel last Tuesday evening. He said he wanted a room for one night. He was sent to the third floor. Later in the evening he went out and didn't come back till midnight. He had evidently been enjoying himself. His breath smelled of whisky. He went up to his room, and that was the last seen of him until early in the morning, when a boy went to call him for his train. The boy got no answer when he knocked at the door, and he opened it and walked in. The folding bed had not been let down. The boy had to look about for a minute or two before he discovered the old man. Then he heard a husky voice from up near the ceiling somewhere. He looked up, and there was the guest curled up on top of the bed, rubbing his eyes. He was fully dressed, with the exception of his big, cowhide boots, which were standing on the floor.

"Say, mister," inquired the boy, "why didn't yer get into bed?"

"B'gosh!" shouted the man, angrily, "there ain't no bed. Here I've been curled up on top of this here sideboard all night without a wink of sleep. Ain't this a nice way to treat a man? Hey?"—Buffalo Express

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

MIDGET AND THE DRAGON.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER I.

Once there lived on the shores of a large lake a tribe of giants who despised small things, and, still more, small people.

None of their kings, queens or princes had been less than twelve feet tall when fully grown, so you can see what an awful fate seemed in store for their most lovely princess when the thirteen headed dragon came out of the swamp and by enchantments caused her to grow smaller instead of larger.

No such misfortune had ever before befallen the kingdom. Previous to this the law had been to send all short people to the other side of the lake, never to return, and it was very distressing to the royal family that this, the fairest, most accomplished and best tempered princess who had ever graced the palace, should be thus enchanted.

To make matters worse the dragon sent word to the giants that the king and queen must immediately proclaim the princess to reign in their stead; also that any soldier or subject disobeying the dwarf queen would receive immediate punishment at his hands.

This for the proud giants was misery untold, and with a queen already less than eight feet tall, and every year growing two inches shorter, it seemed that life was a burden.

Their miseries, however, were not yet over, for the chief captain had a beautiful and sweet tempered daughter, who was also enchanted, and suddenly commenced to grow more and more beautiful, but not an inch taller.

Their common misfortune made the queen and this poor girl, who was called Midget, very close friends, and many a time they wept together over their unhappy lot. One day Midget met a very wise mouse, who told her some comforting truths and sent most kind and respectful messages to the queen.

Of all things the giants hated, a mouse was the most despised, because, although it was so small, yet it was just too large to be ignored, especially if one got into their stockings or made a nest in their finest laces.

The queen, however, was wise and saw immediately that the words of the mouse were wiser than those of all her courtiers, and from that day Midget and the queen were very happy.

Midget commenced to nurse the sick, to help the poor and to befriend all who, like herself, were in any way unfortunate, and although people sometimes whispered, "Pity she is so small that she can never amount to anything," she nevertheless became a great favorite.

For some time the dragon did not trouble his mind with affairs of the giants, hence did not know about the mouse, but he supposed that the giants, who had at first obeyed the dwarf queen through fear of him, would soon rebel and destroy each other. This would have been the case had it not been that the queen was so wise, just, firm and kind that, while they at first obeyed through fear, they soon obeyed from true love and loyalty.

Now, having so fully told you how it came about that the giants were ruled by a young and beautiful dwarf queen, we will see how it fared with one of their number who, years before this, had been banished to the other side of the lake, because when only twenty years old, he was only nine feet tall.

This giant was called Bigun, for on the side of the lake to which he had been exiled he was considered very large. You see our surroundings, while not effecting our real characters, often tend to make or destroy one's reputation.

Bigun now felt so great that his dislike for all small things grow even more than when he was upon his own side of the lake, and so highly did he esteem himself that he married the eldest daughter of the king. Although she was only six feet tall, he thought that, just to be fitted for the honor conferred upon her, she would grow much taller.

When this idea proved a mistake, he was sad, and when year after year passed, and his two noble and handsome sons at nearly twenty years of age were no larger than their mother, he one day met the fool bird, who looked at him with a most wise and admiring expression, and said:

"Oh, great and mighty giant,
So wondrous tall and wise,
So brave and self-reliant,
A feast for beauty's eyes,
Should you have wife and children
So very short and small
That they could never lead the dance
In giant banquet hall?

I know you love them dearly,
Though they are short the while,
But quickly drive them from your house,
For they are not in style.
'Tis sore disgrace they bring you,
And this you surely know,
So send them out; they're out of style
Until they larger grow."

Then the bird flew away and cackled as if to itself:

"Oh, what a wondrous giant!
How beautiful and fair!
I never met his equal,
I swanny, anywhere."

That settled the whole matter. A bird who could see greatness and beauty so plainly and could also talk in verse must surely be wise, truthful, and one to be obeyed without question.

Their parting was very sad, but you see it was not good style for a giant to have small sons and a small wife, and, like anybody

Thorndike Street to be Macadamized.

It will be remembered that at the annual town meeting a sum of money was voted for the permanent repair of highways. This, with the sum left over from last year, amounts to about $3500, which the selectmen propose to expend on Thorndike street in this village, commencing at Main street and carrying the improvement as far as they can with the money available. The road will be shaped to a true grade and then macadamized. Thorndike street is taken because it will afford a practical object lesson to the greatest number of people possible with one strip of road. There is a great deal of travel over this strip, many Bondsville vehicles coming over it into Palmer in addition to the travel from Thorndike. Going from Palmer the hill is hardly steep enough to make a driver contented to let his horse walk, while in its present condition it is almost impossible to trot; with a good macadam surface horses will be able to draw heavier loads and make better time. The Legislature this year authorized the purchase of road machinery by the state, to be placed under the control of the county commissioners and loaned by them to towns, and application will be made for a stone crusher and roller for this work. The shut-offs in the service pipes of the Palmer Water Company which are in the middle of the street have been ordered placed at the side, so that when the improvement is completed there need be no necessity for digging the street up again.

New Fast Freight Service to and From New York.

The new fast freight service announced a few weeks ago as soon to be installed by the Central Vermont road between New York and all points along its line, is now in working order, and is greatly appreciated by shippers both to and from that city. Two new steel hull steamers, the "Mohawk" and "Mohegan," have been built and put in commission, each 280 feet long by 60 feet beam, capacity 1250 tons, equipped with triple expansion engines, electric lights, steam steering gear, and all that goes to make up a first-class vessel. These make an average time of 6½ to 7 hours between New York and New London, against 10 to 14 hours before, and in connection with a fast freight train over the road, give shippers excellent accommodations. Freight leaving New York at 7 in the evening reaches Norwich at 7.10 the next morning, Willimantic at 8.20 and Palmer at 10.10; Brattleboro is reached at 3 p. m., Windsor at 7.50; it arrives in St. Albans at 7 and Montreal at 11 on the second morning, Malone, Norwood and Ogdensburg, N. Y., in season for delivery on the afternoon of that day. Going south the train arrives in Palmer at 4.35 in the afternoon, leaving at 5, and freight is received up to 4.35, arriving in New York for the opening of business the next morning.

Unsuccessful Liquor Raid.

The prosecuting committee made a raid on F. L. Pierce at his Commercial street restaurant last Friday evening about 9 o'clock, and took possession of that and his harness shop near by in a search for the ardent. The premises were thoroughly investigated, but nothing contraband was found. As the searchers were about to leave a bystander commenced to hoot one of the officers, but was quickly silenced by a request to have a care as to the nature of his remarks, and a suggestion that a little respect for the officers of the law might be a good thing for him.

She registered from Holyoke.

They are not yet ready to report on the Palmer building.

Pearl, the eight-years-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Rhodes, died at the home of her parents on Dewey Hill Monday forenoon at 11, having been an invalid for the past nine or ten months. On returning from school one day last fall she fell and hurt her knee; the next day she was taken with typhoid fever. Recovering from this, the injury received by the fall made itself apparent, the spine and hip being affected, and for several months she has suffered intensely. A bright and cheerful disposition helped to make her pain easier until the end.

Attention is called once more to the fact that all the merchants of the place—save one—have signed an arrangement to close their stores at noon on Saturday, the Fourth, and not open them again until Monday morning. Housekeepers who wish to provide meats, vegetables or groceries for their Sunday dinner must do so before noon of that day, the one merchant who refused to sign the agreement not being of the class which serves that part of man's necessities. Be careful, or your Sunday dinner may lack some of the things which you were planning to have.

There was a narrow escape from a fire Tuesday in the house on School street recently owned by Timothy Fuller. W. H. Higgins was there repairing a water pipe, when the occupants told him that smoke had been coming for three days from a chimney which had not been used for some time. An examination showed that the soot in the bottom of the chimney was on fire, and that the fire had eaten down until it was next to the woodwork. A hole in the chimney was made and the fire removed, no serious damage having resulted, though had it continued without discovery a conflagration would probably have resulted.

Deputy Sheriff Studley, who has been looking for a certain horse-thief for about two years, got word early Wednesday morning that his man was at the passenger station. He hustled down and took into custody the man pointed out, only to find out later that he was a resident of Palmer in good and regular standing. The man was scared about out of his wits however, and said he knew several people who on investigation failed to recognize him; this only made Mr. Studley feel confident that he had the right man, though after a while the victim found a business man who identified him, and he went on his way rejoicing.

Dexter W. Lombard was charged with drunkenness, and his case was continued until to-morrow. "Deck" was found on Main street late Friday night in an intoxicated condition, and making considerable noise. Officer Eastman started him toward home, but he returned in a short time noiser than ever, and the officer attempted to arrest him on West Main street, near Knox street. Although crippled in his hands, "Deck's" lungs are good, and he is a past master in the art of profanity; the whole neigborhood was aroused by his howls and indecent mouthings, which only ceased after he had been choked almost unconscious by the officer and John Coles, who was called to assist in the arrest. The two men had their hands full to got the prisoner into a wagon and to the lock-up.

The remains were taken to St. Mary's church, where brief funeral services were held. The floral gifts were many and handsome. The bearers were John Roche, Charles Gerald, Napoleon Gingras, Michael Hurley, Moses Longtine, Thomas Morrison. The interment took place in the Catholic cemetery. Mr. and Mrs. Leary have the sympathy of many friends in their deep sorrow.

Let Us Have a New Station.

The patrons of the Ware River branch of the Boston & Albany railroad here think it about time that the company should supply the public with better accommodations for a passenger station. There is scarcely a day when there is not a line of freight and coal cars stationed on the track, and patrons are obliged to squeeze between the cars to get to the station. On Memorial Day about 300 people took the train to Forest Lake, and were compelled to wedge their way between two cars in order to do so. The present state of affairs is not only dangerous, but is far from accommodating the public.

Officer Collins attempted to arrest one of the men who was making an unusual amount of annoyance, when the wife of the victim interfered, rushing wildly at the officer; she scratched his face badly and tore his clothes, and he was obliged to call for help. The fellow was captured after a while and taken to Palmer.

Miss Catherine Moriarty, who died Friday at her home in this village, was a very popular young lady. She was a member of the class of '93 of the Palmer high school, where she won many friends on account of her kind manner and sweet disposition. After leaving school she lived at home, being in poor health. The funeral was held at the Catholic church and was attended by a large number of her friends and relatives. The floral offerings were beautiful and many. Her five cousins acted as bearers; the burial was in the cemetery at Thorndike.

Nearly one hundred people gathered at the schoolhouse Friday afternoon to witness the graduation of the ninth grade pupils. The room was hung with pink and leghorn, the class colors, and decorated with water lilies, ferns, daisies and roses. Conspicuous among the decorations were "96," made of pink roses placed in a background of daisies, and the class motto, "Onward," also of pink roses. The exercises were well given, much to the credit of both teacher and pupils. Miss Cleveland, who has worked faithfully in the training of the graduates during the past two weeks, is receiving much commendation from their parents and friends.

Pretty Church Wedding.

Miss Nellie Quirk, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Quirk, and John J. Manning of Three Rivers were married Wednesday afternoon in St. Bartholomew's church, of whose choir Miss Quirk was a member. Rev. B. F. McKeany performed the ceremony in the presence of a large number of friends and relatives. The wedding march was played by Miss Delia Clifford, the organist of the church. The ushers were followed by the bride and best man. Then came the groom and bridesmaid. They were met at the alter by the officiating clergyman and the impressive ring service was then performed. The bride was handsomely attired in brown silk trimmed with Irish point lace and carried a bouquet of bride roses. The bridesmaid, was Miss Kate Quirk, a sister of the bride, was dressed in a gown of brown novelty with Persian trimmings, and also carried a bouquet of roses. The best man was Daniel Manning, brother of the groom. The ushers were P. J. O'Connor of Springfield, Thomas O'Connor of South Hadley, Daniel Quirk of Ware, John Austin, Michael Griffin and Thomas Quirk of Bondsville. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Manning received their many friends at the home of the bride, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Quirk aiding them in receiving. The house was tastefully decorated with ferns and flowers. After the reception dancing was indulged in on a large platform, which was built on the lawn for the occasion. There was a large array of presents. Mr. and Mrs. Manning left for a short trip to Boston and vicinity, and upon their return they will live in Thorndike. There were many guests from Springfield, Holyoke, South Hadley, Three Rivers and Thorndike.

Saw The Point Finally.

A man said, "When I was a young chap, I could use coffee and tobacco without their troubling me, but as I got along in years, they both distressed me. I quit tobacco, but only got a little better; liver, stomach and bowels kept all out of gear until finally my old doctor told me that coffee had the same poisonous alkaloids as tobacco, but not quite so many, and advised me to leave it off and give nature a chance to build up. I didn't take much stock in the old man's advice, but found out by trying it that he was just right. Still I missed my hot drink at breakfast and supper—tried chocolate, but that lacks the taste I like, and tea don't exactly go to the spot. Lately I have been drinking Postum Cereal Coffee and like it better than the old coffee. It has that pungent taste that fits my notion of a hot drink and it agrees with me well enough so that I have put on 10 pounds a month. It is made of grains wholly, and brews a deep, rich color like the finest Mocha. Wife buys it at the grocery and it costs us about one-third what coffee used to." It comes from Battle Creek, Mich.

Dr. Henry Venne, 99 Blue Island Ave., Chicago, says: "The Postum has been tested and found to be excellent."

Beware of the fraudulent imitation of the original Postum Cereal Grain coffee. Insist on Postum.

A Pretty Home Wedding.

Lucretia H. Walker and Fred D. Rogers were married at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edson M. Walker, on East Hill, Wednesday at 6 p. m., in the presence of about 60 guests. The house was prettily decorated with maiden-hair fern and flowers, daisies predominating. The parlor in which the ceremony was performed was particularly pretty, the flower display being quite elaborate. The ushers were Alva M. Walker and James T. Rood of Worcester. The bride was unattended except by her one-year-old nephew, Howard W. Walker, who held her bouquet during the ceremony, which was performed with a ring by Rev. F. S. Hatch of the Congregational church. The wedding march was played by Miss Rood of Worcester. The bride wore a lovely gown of white organdie, with trimmings of lace. The gifts were numerous and elegant, including a dining room set from Monson Grange, of which the couple are members, and a silver service from teachers with whom the bride was associated. Among the guests from out of town were Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Walker of North Brookfield, Mr. and Mrs. John Hitchcock, M. T. Hitchcock of Springfield, Mr. and Mrs. Alva S. Walker, Miss Alice Walker of Belchertown, Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Marcy of Palmer, Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Sikes, Miss Lillie Miller of Ludlow, Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Ballard, Miss Sarah Walker of Hampden, Miss Annie Taylor of Easthampton, James T. and Miss Clara Rood of Worcester. The bride taught in the public schools for some time, including five years in the Green street primary. Never was a teacher more popular in Monson with parents and pupils. Mr. and Mrs. Rogers are active members of the Congregational church. Monson people wish them bright skies and much happiness. They will be at home on their farm in a few days.

Peculiar Action of Two Strangers.

Monson has had a sensation this week. On Friday night two men left the evening train from Palmer and went to the Monson House, where they registered as J. D. Thomas of Boston and L. B. Crawford of Hartford. They were apparently unknown to each other, but are said to have resembled each other somewhat in appearance. Both asked for teams for Tuesday morning, and to be called at 5.30. While they were waiting for their teams in the morning one asked the where he was going, and when the reply was made that he was going to "Wilbraham, Three Rivers and around," the questioner said that it was a pity that they were not going the same way so that they might go in one carriage. Both went up Academy Hill, and both said they should be back at noon in order to avoid being out in the heat. When two o'clock came and the teams were not in, the hostler, Jerry Fitzgerald, began to grow anxious. Mr. Clifford, however, did not think that the men could be horse thieves, but at the same time felt uneasy. Early in the evening he received a telegram from Springfield saying that the horses were all right and that a letter would advise him of their whereabouts. Mr. Clifford left for Springfield Sunday monring, where he visited a number of stables and notified police, but no trace of the horses could be found. On Monday morning he received the promised letter, telling that one team was in Springfield and one in Scitico. Telephoning to these places Mr. Clifford was informed that the teams were there, and he went after them Monday. The horse at Scitico seemed considerably jaded, so Mr. Clifford decided to leave him in Springfield for a few days, but drove home the other horse.

A number of Monson people have attended commencement at Amherst this week, including Prof. and Mrs. James H. Tufts, who were the guests of Prof. Garmace; Prof. Edward L. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Cushman and their guests, Miss Katherine of New Hartford and Stephen Janes of Boston.

It is said that the New England Telephone Company has had complaints about the service in Monson. The buzzing and snapping sound heard almost constantly is most annoying. Those who are on metallic circuits feel that they do not get the service they pay for. The business men who put in telephones principally to be connected with the telegraph office feel that they have special cause for complaint, as mistakes are unavoidable.

The death of Mrs. Alice Tucker Terhune, wife of Dr. Terhune of Passaic, N. J., is a grief to her many Monson friends. The end came on Saturday from pneumonia, and was not unexpected. She leaves an infant. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joel Tucker, and was born in Monson 28 years ago. She leaves three brothers and a sister, Rev. Fred M. Tucker of Illinois, Ralph D. of Yale University, Arthur and Miss Carrie of Monson.

Chief Engineer Needham has made his return to assistant state fire marshal Spencer regarding the cause of last week's fire as "Unknown, but that it probably caught in a pile of rags in the attic." He favors the theory of combustion, although there is a chance that a spark from the chimney may have ignited the rags. The value of the house is $1000; insurance $900; damage to the building $100. There was no insurance upon the contents, and the damage was small. The insurance is placed through the Morris and Farrington agency, and the adjustment at $163 is perfectly satisfactory to all concerned.

The school committee held a meeting Monday evening and voted to replace the double seats with single ones in the primary and intermediate departments at No. 8, and to change the present method of heating the building. Jacketed stoves will be placed in the intermediate and grammar rooms, and the large furnace now in the building will be used to heat the primary room. Frye's geography will be introduced into the primary grades the coming year. The geographies now used will not be discarded at once, but when one wears out it will be replaced by Frye's. Vertical writing will also be taught in the primary grades.

Mrs. Jane Underwood died last Friday night of cancer, after great suffering, which she bore with great patience. The funeral was held Monday at the home of her brother, Francis N. Wood of Wood Hill. Mrs. Underwood was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey Wood, and was born in the house which stood where the house in which she died now stands. She was married in 1856 to Henry H. Underwood of the 27th Mass. regiment, who died some ten years ago. The greater part of her life, with the exception of ten years, was spent in Monson, and the past two years have been spent at the home of her brother. She leaves another brother, Rufus M., of Los Angeles, Cal., and a sister, Mrs. Gilligan. Mrs. Underwood was a Second Adventist, and a clergyman of that faith from South Lancaster officiated at the funeral. The burial was in the Center cemetery.

If you eat what you like, and digest it, you will surely be strong and healthy.

But if you don't digest it, you might almost as well not eat, for what good can your food do you if it doesn't nourish you?

If you find that you can't digest it, there is a simple help for your stomach.

It is Shaker Digestive Cordial, made by the Shakers of Mount Lebanon. It has never failed to cure the worst case of indigestion.

Strength and health come from the food you eat, after it has been digested and has gone into the blood.

The best tonic is digested food. The best aid to digestion, Shaker Digestive Cordial.

When you have acid eructations, nausea, headache, wind, dizziness, offensive breath, or any other symptoms of dyspepsia, Shaker Digestive Cordial will cure you.

At druggists. Trial bottle 10 cents.

Found Dead in Bed.

Walter Bennett, 19, son of Baxter C. Bennett of Holland, was found dead in bed Sunday morning at the home of Mrs. Edwin Webber, for whom he was working as a farm hand. Medical Examiner Holbrook of Palmer was summoned, and announced the cause of his death to be acute congestion of the brain, not deeming an autopsy necessary. Young Bennett had worked all day, and about seven in the evening started for Sherman's pond to go swimming with a dozen or more others. He was behind the appointed time, and with three companions ran a long distance and became very much heated; he went into the water at once, remaining there about an hour. After dressing he attempted to cross the pond in a boat, which struck a rock and shipped some water, wetting his feet thoroughly. He then walked to the village and drank freely of the water at the fountain; returning home he retired about ten, feeling chilly. About midnight Mrs. Webber's sister was awakened by a scream, and soon heard another. She stepped into the hall and listened, but heard nothing more than heavy breathing, which was supposed to be that of Mrs. Webber's son, who is troubled with asthma. In the morning when it was time for Bennett to get up he did not appear, and on being called was found dead. He had always been in good health, and his death was undoubtedly caused by going in the water when heated, and drinking large quantities of cold water afterward.

Marvelous Results.

From a letter written by Rev. J. Gunderman of Dimondale, Mich., we are permitted to make this extract: "I have no hesitation in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery, as the results were almost marvelous in the case of my wife. While I was pastor of the Baptist church at the Rives Junction she was brought down with pneumonia succeeding la grippe. Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little interruption, and it seemed as if she could not survive them. A friend recommended Dr. King's New Discovery; it was quick in its work and highly satisfactory in results." Trial bottles free of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware. Any one can get this insurance for 25 cents, being the price of a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. In almost every neighborhood some one has died from an attack of bowel complaint before medicine could be procured or a physician summoned. One or two doses of this remedy will cure any ordinary case. It never fails. Can you afford to take the risk for so small an amount? For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

THAT JOB OF PRINTING, There's no better place at which to get it done than the JOURNAL Office. Experienced workmen, skilled in every branch of the art.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

who pretends to be somebody, he must keep up appearances, especially when the fool bird so decreed.

It happened that for lack of any better plan the banished mother and sons soon found themselves on the beach at the edge of the lake. Their surprise was very great to see a handsome boat tied to a small tree, and on the bow of the boat a mouse with a tall silk hat on his head and a red silk necktie at his throat.

As soon as they approached the boat the mouse said: "Lady, this boat is for you and the young men. It is mine, and I now invite you to come into it, and go to the castle, where small people will soon be in very high esteem."

Now, the fact is that this was none other than our friend who had been a friend to Midget and the queen, and just as he had gained the respect of these other two small people, he now won the confidence of the mother and her sons.

"Step two paces to the right before you get in, pick up the two swords you will find behind the rock, and then come into the boat," said the mouse.

After obeying this strange order they seemed no better off than before, for, surely, where were the sails and where were the oars?

Nevertheless they took seats and immediately the mouse said to Jethro, "Put the point of your sword in the water, wave it to the right and left, and I will steer."

Jethro obeyed, and what was his surprise to find the boat gliding through the water at a wonderful speed, so that in a few minutes they were on the other side, at the water gate of the queen's palace.

The palace of the queen was a wonderful building. There were arches and large granite pillars along the water front, and you could row a boat under the arches where it would be out of sight of any one on the shore.

These arched waterways led to stairs of the purest marble, and should you go up a flight of these steps you would wonder at the beautiful statues, the sculpture, and the fountains along the way.

"I now invite you to come into it."

Strange as it may seem, no one had seen them and they had seen no one.

Now the queen had granted the mouse two fine rooms in the palace for the entertainment of such guests as he might wish to bring, and as Midget had also arranged to carry food and other supplies to their rooms at any time the mouse might ask such attention, our friends were now well provided with both food and shelter. Their presence in the palace was as yet a profound secret.

While the mouse was absent the thirteen headed dragon had sent a message to the queen that he would like a dozen fine giants for slaves and servants. He would, he said, come after them in two weeks, and at the same time, as his serpents were getting hungry, he would also take a few giants for their food. Both the queen and her subjects considered this demand as very impolite, and wished to avoid such an unpleasant occurence as being eaten by his serpents, but how to escape puzzled the wisest and dismayed the bravest. Resistance seemed to be useless, for heretofore the dragon had been able to defeat their whole army.

COURTESY.

A wise and good man, Sir Arthur Helps, has said that "it is a duty to use courtesy to animals." Any boy or girl who will give the matter a moment's thought will see that it is so.

Treat your pets courteously, and they will speedily prove, by their good manners, that they both understand and appreciate the example set for them.

A very young member of our society was dancing through the hall of her home the other day, and accidentally trod, with all her small weight, on her dog's paw. "Oh, please excuse me, Pumpkin!" she exclaimed, so quickly and naturally that the other people who heard her laughed. Thus unceremoniously aroused from a nap, the dog thumped his bushy tail upon the floor, and looked up at his little mistress lovingly. He knew that the pain she had given him was unintentional; he accepted her apology—like a gentleman.

After all, words mean very little. A kind tone, a quick note of sympathy are what go to the heart. We have heard "excuse me" spoken so carelessly that we doubt not but the speaker would have been much embarrassed if instantly called upon to repeat what he said. It is better perhaps, to be polite by force of habit than not to be polite at all; but mere lip-politeness is a poor thing. The manners that "makes man" spring from the heart. The lower animals are as much more easily trained by courtesy as are boys and girls. From the teacher who expounds to you with a patient consideration of your ignorance and a desire to help you learn, you learn best—particularly if you pay courteous attention. Have you noticed that courtesy to animals is rarely thrown away? If a pet horse, or dog, or any other animal, fails to respond to a kind effort to teach him some thing, or to induce him to do his usual work, call in a veterinarian at once. Something is physicially wrong.

But young people, yea, and older people, are not always ill when their thougths wander or they shirk the duty that lies before them.

The naturalist Thoreau complains of man's "not educating a horse, not trying to develop his nature, but merely getting work out of him;" the humane Count Tolstoi, when asked why he used no whip in driving, replied:

"I talk to my horses; I do not beat them." Both those men loved animals in the right way.

Often when there is no ill usage, owners of animals fail to appreciate them as intelligent beings. Mr. H. S. Salt, who has written a book upon "Animals Rights," says:

"Domestic animals have a special claim on man's courtesy and sense of fairness, inasmuch as they are not his fellow workers, his dependents, and, in many cases, the familiar associates and trusted inmates of the home."

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Merury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physcians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Home Entertainments.

New England people are charged with inhospitality. Not with respect to public affairs,—great praise is often bestowed when elaborate public entertainments are given, as was the case last summer, when Boston entertained the Y. P. S. C. E. and the Knight Templars. But it is said that New Englanders do not entertain in their homes, and this charge is made against all classes. The wealthy and the society people even, it is said, do not compare in this respect with the people of other countries or even with the people of the West and South. And no doubt it is true, that, as a rule, New England people of any class do not keep open house and entertain guests, either strangers or their friends, as do people of the same class elsewhere. Why, is often asked, and a great many answers are given, according to who makes them. Unfortunately the answer of those "not to the manner born" is not so complimentary to us as the answer we make for ourselves. They say sometimes, bluntly, that New England people are unsocial and stingy.

Many ladies whose homes are in the country villages admit that there is too little social life, and deplore the fact. They say "The only places where we meet people socially are at church affairs and other public entertainments." I remember hearing a gentleman of influence and position in a certain place say, after spending a very pleasant evening at the house of a friend, "I have been in this town ten years, and that is the second time I have been invited out." It is not because ladies do not appreciate social life, nor is it, I believe, because they are "stingy" that a great many people could truthfully repeat this gentleman's remark. The same difficulties seem to lie in the way of home entertainment among the older people and among the young people. "We are very busy," a lady says, "then our house isn't very large, we use the whole of it and something is always shabby. If I were to give an entertainment there would be several new pieces of furniture to be bought, and a caterer for a large party is expensive. I'm afraid we cannot afford it. I wish I could entertain people." A large formal reception is an elaborate affair; the music, flowers, service and everything necessary do cost a great deal of time and money. People in moderate circumstances cannot afford a reception, nor a dinner party which costs, even more, oftener than once in twenty years or so, nor in reality are such affairs very social.

The idea seems to be that a home entertainment must be elaborate or nothing. If you know a lady well enough, one who wishes to entertain but does not, she will admit that she does not know how to entertain her friends within her means, and so she does not try.

"The feast of reason and the flow of soul" is what we seek in social life. If we have no reason and no soul the "costliest viands" will fail to promote sociability. We should invite our friends to visit us for the pleasure we take in their society, not to feed them, and they should come to us with that understanding.

Ladies in many of our villages have learned this, and they can entertain a good many friends in one afternoon in a simple, informal fashion, at a little expense. To make the subject more real, I will describe a pleasant afternoon which I spent a few days ago.

"From three to five o'clock."—The invitation came to three of us in one envelope. It was the visiting card of Mr. and Mrs. Rothery. Across the top of the card was written "To meet Miss Whiting," and under the names, "at home;" beneath that, "Monday, June 1st, from 3 to 5."

So Monday afternoon I put on my prettiest gown and went to the reception. Mrs. Rothery has a new house. There is a large hall out of which opens eastward a dining room and westward a parlor. There are no doors, but broad portieres. A young lady in white received me and took my sunshade, and passed me along into the parlor. Mrs. Rothery was receiving with Miss Whiting. A bit of a shower had delayed people, so although it was not early there were not many present and I had an opportunity to speak to Mrs. Rothery in a few moments. She was simply dressed in a cream white woolen gown, trimmed with a little silk about the neck and on the front of the basque. There were a few vases of flowers and potted plants about, but no more nor different than one has in the house every day at this season. Most of the people present I had met and I chatted with one another, moving about the room a little as more people came in. Soon a young lady, whom I knew, asked me if I would like to go to the dining room. There she seated me beside two ladies of my acquaintance who greeted me as I came near them.

After I had been served with refreshments I went back to the parlor, staid as long as I had time, speaking with people whom I knew, being introduced to others. I found several ladies whom I had wished to see for a few minutes about special matters, and thus was saved considerable time, if indeed I should have considered the matters of sufficient importance to have called upon the ladies concerning them. Having tarried an hour, perhaps, I bade Mrs. Rothery and Miss Whiting good-bye and went home.

Now I want to describe the dining room and its arrangements, because that seems to be the bugbear to those who wish to entertain their friends. The table, spread in the middle of the room, was an ordinary black walnut extension table drawn out so that it was perhaps five feet long. I noticed these details because I was intending to write the affair up for you; I do not think any one else could have minded. There was a tea-cloth spread at either end, neither of them especially handsome, and on each the chocolate was served from chocolate pots. A young lady in white presided at either, and there were other young ladies, two or three—perhaps more, who passed the chocolate. About the chocolate pots on the table were dainty cups and saucers and spoons ready for the chocolate, and near at hand a few dainty teaplates. In the center of the table was a high vase of flowers and about on the table a few plates containing refreshments. Nothing was crowded nor piled. There was no hurry nor confusion. There were only people enough brought into the room to fill the chairs ranged on either side against the walls. At the end of the room opposite the entrance from the hall, there was a young lady who presided over and served frappe from a large punch bowl. This bowl stood on a stand over which was placed a tray-cloth. Each young lady who waited upon us had a small tray. I noticed that one tray was silver and another was Japaned and had a doily over it. I was passed a cup of chocolate with spoon and saucer. The chocolate was delicate and had a spoonful of whipped cream upon it, put there from a bowl of cream that stood upon the table by the young lady who served me. Then she passed me a lettuce sandwich, and when I had drunk my chocolate and eaten my sandwich she took my chocolate cup and saucer and passed me the ice served in a glass with a spoon. She also passed a dish with dainty confections.

Everything was dainty, delicate and delicious; in all it was a bit of refreshment that was very grateful. It was all simple, informal and delightful, and we had a much lovelier time than we would have had at a stiff and informal reception. There was no attempt at display, no masses of flowers, no grand music, just an afternoon call upon a hundred people, perhaps, and a few minutes' chat with each. A week afterward I called upon Mrs. Rothery, and her house seemed to be exactly the same as at her reception. I think she made no change for the party except to arrange the chairs more conveniently. Now, don't you think that was a nice, pretty way to entertain friends? We did. What did we talk about? I shall have to leave that for another week, and sometime I will publish recipes for the articles served as refreshments.

This invitation from Mrs. Rothery was in response to a similar gathering that my two friends and I gave last winter, similar to Mrs. Rotery's "afternoon" except that our house is not nearly as convenient, as our rooms have doors between them and our dining room is down stairs. But every body knew that we were in a college dormitory and did not mind, although we utilized a large sleeping room for a dining room. In college, you know, we have to use our one or two rooms for everything, and we do not have bedsteads as other people do, but mantle beds; that is, we have draped mantels, which is not true of all college houses.

Next week I will tell you what we serve for refreshments in the winter, and then what we had at another winter "afternoon tea." Then will follow a description of several college spreads.

An Outland Voyage.

The tall ships come and the tall ships go
Across the purple bay;
But there's never a ship so fair and fine
Never a ship so brave as mine,
As mine that sailed away.

Bright in the light and gray in the shade
And white when the waves glow dun;
The gulls go by with their great wings spread;
But the sails of my ship were gold and red
And they shone like the setting sun.

They make cheer in the tavern here,
The sailors home from sea;
But the crew of my ship they feast with kings
In emerald crowns and opal rings
And coats of the cramoisie.

Fine is the freight their ships bring in,
But mine bears finer far;
Pearls and roses and links of gold,
Myrrh and amber and rich bales rolled
As bright as the morning star.

'Twas May-day morn when my ship set sail
With dew on her figurehead;
Her bows were wreathed with hawthorne bloom
As she stole through the dusk of the dawning gloom
Like a ghost, or a bride new-wed.

The May-days dawn and the May-days die
And the hour draws near I know;
The day when my ship shall come for me
To carry me back to my own countrie
East of the sun by the outmost sea,
Into the heart of the Long Ago.

A HERO OF HENLEY.

"I—I—oh, dear, I don't want to go to Henley, at all," sobbed Maud Withrington, miserably.

"Come, come, old sis, you'll like it when you're there. You'll see him rowing, you know," answered Mabel, in a consoling tone.

"But I don't want to see him rowing. I never want to see him under any circumstances again. It—it—only makes it harder to bear, now that—that—everthing is over between us."

"I am sorry for you, Maud, dear," exclaimed Mabel, placing her arm around her sister's waist and trying to kiss away some of the tears which were coursing down her cheeks. "But you must try to take a more cheerful view. Perhaps papa will relent."

"Papa will never relent. He can't relent. You—you—know as well as I do that—that—his circumstances make that impossible. Besides, I'm—engaged to—to—Old Scratch. That is why papa insists upon my going to-day, because Old Scratch is coming. I—I—hate Old Scratch; and I wish I was dead!" finished up Maud, with energy.

"I am sure," said Mabel, with confidence, "that Mr. Spilshank is a gentleman, and that if he were to learn the state of your feelings, he would immediately release you from your engagement. Don't you think so yourself?"

"Y-e-s, I think he would. But—but—I can't tell him. I—I—promised papa; and—and—I'm in honor bound to keep the secret. Besides, if—if—I were to tell him, and he were to break off the engagement, papa would—would—at once bring down one of his horrid stock exchange friends—somebody much worse than Old Scratch—and insist upon my accepting him. Oh, it's cruel! It's a shame—to be placed in this position. I—I—wish I was the ugliest and most unattractive girl in the three kingdoms."

Plain Mabel sighed. She would have been quite content to relieve Maud of her burden of good looks, had such a readjustment been possible. Perhaps, also, she did not think it any great hardship to be engaged to Old Scratch—a jolly, well-preserved gentleman, who was not yet past the prime of life, and had some £15,000 per annum to his fortune. It was not as though he was a man of objectionable or tyrannical character. Quite the reverse. He was a kindly, courteous, considerate gentleman, against whom nobody could find a word to say. If people did find fault with him at all, it was for being Quixotically generous and absurdly confiding. That, apparently, was the worst that could be raked up to his discredit.

The nickname "Old Scratch," which had stuck to him ever since his young manhood, had first arisen in reference to his repute as a skuller. For four successive years he was amateur champion of the Thames; and in every handicap for which he entered he was always placed on the scratch mark. He had long ago given up these aquatic contests, except in the character of spectator and mentor to young aspirants, who always took the veteran's hints with attention and respect. He was the more looked up to by them on account of his modest, but withal genial, disposition. And it is doubtful whether the Leander, or for the matter of that, any boat club on the Thames, contained a better known or more popular member than Old Scratch.

Maud's engagement to this popular gentleman came about in this way:

Her father, a stock broker in a large way of business, about a year previously had met with a run of unlucky speculations, which crippled him considerably. Instead of giving up his large house and his expensive way of living, he embarked on some highly risky financial operations, in the hope of bringing off a coup. The usual result followed. He landed himself in worse difficulties. In fact, so bad had his pecuniary position become, that—although his name and credit were still publicly unimpaired—he stood on the verge of ruin and disgrace.

About this time a wealthy stockjobber of his acquaintance—Fladsby by name—began to evince a partiality for Withrington's youngest daughter, Maud. The girl had already given her affections to Charles Milligan, the famous Oxonian, whose prowess as a sculler had already made him a public character. He was a handsome, manly young fellow twenty-three years of age, but unfortunately the possessor of only a diminutive income. While things went well with him, Withrington permitted the little affair between these two young persons to continue; but when he became hard hit, and it was a matter of serious moment to him to introduce money into his family, he at once put a stopper on Charlie Milligan's visits.

Maud protested with tears. Her father took her into his study and "talked to" her. He confided to her his precise position (or as much of it as suited his purpose), painted in harrowing colors the consequences of her refusal to comply with his wishes—that was to encourage Fladsby—and finally appealed to her better feelings, as his child, to save his own gray hairs and the family name from irretrievable disgrace.

Fladsby was a gilded vulgarian, a pompus, consequential buck, rising fifty, but aping the dress and manners of thirty. She hated his sensual face and affected airs. His coarse and fulsome compliments disgusted her. When he attempted love-making, he simply moved her to loathing. What might have occurred, had matters in this direction reached a critical point, it is impossible to say. Before Fladsby had actually proposed for Maud's hand, another admirer turned up. He was a man whose acquaintance Withrington made one day at the club, and whom, having learned that he was wealthy, he took care to cultivate by asking him to his house.

This man, whose name was Spilshank, had not been at Withrington's half a dozen times before his admiration for Maud grew apparent. He was in every way an improvement on Fladsby—from the father's standpoint, because he was richer, more generous, a better subject for prospective bleeding; from the daughter's, because he was a refined, kind hearted, considerate gentleman. The upshot of it was that Fladsby—to his chagrin—received a peremptory conge, and Maud, in her thankfulness to escape from that atrocious monster, made less difficulty than her father expected about accepting Spilshank's offer.

Withrington was greatly annoyed when Old Scratch announced his intention of taking them all down to Henley to see the race for the diamond sculls. "Wouldn't he prefer to go on one of the other days?" suggested the stockbroker. "Oh, no," said Spilshank. "Not the same thing at all. He especially wanted to see the famous Charles Milligan—the man who held the same position in aquatics now as he himself had done twenty-five years back. Therefore, if it was all the same to Mr. Withrington, he should much prefer to make the excursion on that particular day."

It was not till the race of the diamond sculls drew near that the poor's girl's lethargic demeanor brightened up. Maud would not easily forget that race. How eagerly she waited for the skiffs to come in sight. How her heart jumped when they appeared around the bend; how it thrilled as she heard clapping and cheering, and loud shouts of Milligan—Milligan. They came abreast, the two competitors. Milligan was leading by a length. His manly frame looked superb in rowing costume. How beautifully and with what ease he sculled. The other man, a Cantab, was now in distress. Milligan went as fresh as paint. He simply had the race in hand.

But he spurted just for the finish, and passed the winning post three lengths in front.

"Well sculled—well sculled indeed, Charles Milligan!" thundered a heavy voice at her elbow, and two powerful hands began to clap with a noise resembling the report of a pistol.

Maud started around like one awakened from a blissful dream. There stood Old Scratch. He was watching her face. No doubt he wondered why her eyes had suddenly grown so bright and why her cheeks were so flushed, and her face so strained and eager.

"His form was grand, was it not?" exclaimed Old Scratch, with enthusiasm. "I could see that you admired it, my dear. I am glad that you appreciate form. After all there is nothing like it, is there? Once upon a time, before you were born, my dear," added Old Scratch, in a wistful tone, "I could scull like that myself. But age tells on a man—doesn't it, Maud? And sooner or later the youngest are bound to win."

Next morning, shortly after breakfast, Maud was summoned from the girls' boudoir by her father to an interview in his study. She went down stairs with a beating heart, expecting to be scathingly reproved for her conduct at Henley yesterday. But she was agreeably mistaken, for he did not utter a word of rebuke. He did, however, appear to be slightly annoyed although he found no fault, merely saying, with a rather cold intonation, "Maud, Mr. Spilshank has called to see you privately. He is in the drawing room now. You had better go to him at once."

"Yes, papa," said the girl, turning upon him a look, half-frightened, half-imploring, of her large black eyes.

Her father took no notice of the look. He turned away and busied himself with some letters. But no words came, and, without further attempt to unbosom herself, she left her father's presence and went to the drawing room.

Old Scratch stood on the hearthrug, awaiting her.

"Sit down, my dear," he said to her, wheeling forward an armchair. "I have a little something to say to you, which will take time."

"It is a little story," said Old Scratch, at length, smiling gravely. "Once upon a time, my dear, there lived a a fine young fellow and a pretty, charming girl, who loved one another devotedly. But the young man had no money, and his sweetheart's father, being in difficulties, urged her, compelled her, I may say, to give up her poor lover, and to accept the attentions of a rich old scoundrel. She was a dear, good girl. She acted for the best. She responded to her father s appeal.

"I—I—," ejaculated Maud, gasping and with rosy cheeks. "I—I—"

"Wait a bit, my dear," Old Scratch stopped her gently. "I have not finished yet. This young fellow, in absolute despair at the fate which threatened his love, came to an old friend—and implored his assistance to save the girl. This old friend was a queer, whimsical old fellow. He could have made his favorite, Charles, a present of a plum on the spot, in which case the young lady's father would have readily received him. But he chose to do things in his own whimsical way.

He loved Charles, my dear, and knew him to be the best youngster in the world; but he didn't know the young lady, and he wanted to be quite sure, my dear, that she was worthy of his favorite. So this curious, round-about old fogy, knowing that his great wealth would open a certain house to him at will, obtained an introduction to a certain young lady's father, and soon appeared himself in the light of that young lady's elderly suitor. The young lady, having made a promise to her father, was too good a girl to betray a certain little matter to the old fogy, (for her father's sake) she accepted his proposal. Stay, stay, my dear; I haven't quite finished yet.

"Well, this old gentleman soon saw that Charles' sweetheart was a dear, sweet girl, in every way worthy of him. And if he—the old gentleman—was in any doubt that the girl loved Charles with all her warm, little heart, the doubt was dispelled as he stood beside her at Henley yesterday and watched her charming face when Charles won the diamond sculls.

"So, now, my dear, he has given Charles the intended plum; he has made it all right with the young lady's father, and, in short, Charles is waiting for her in the library.

Maud sprang from her chair. She wreathed her arms around the neck of Old Scratch. She kissed him again and again. Tenderly he released those entwining arms.

"My dear," he said playfully, "do not make it harder than it already is for this whimsical old fellow to give up his charming betrothed. He does not like doing it—he doesn't indeed; but he recognizes Nature's law, my dear," concluded Old Scratch, a little wistfully, "and has the sense to know that, sooner or later, the youngsters are bound to win."—London Truth.

Longhead—"Madam, I wish to draw your attention to the sad case of a poor family. The father is too old to work, the mother is bedridden, and the five little children are crying for bread. To cap all, the poor creatures are about to be turned out on the street, unless some one will pay their arrears of rent, amounting to $30." Mrs. Kindheart—"How terrible! Here is the $30 for the rent. By the way, may I ask you who you are?" Longhead (as he disappeared)—"Certainly, madam; I am the landlord."—New York Tribune.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

MIDGET AND THE DRAGON.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER II.

The giants in despair began to inquire who would go to meet the dragon, either to kill him or satisfy his demands, and when the mouse heard of this state of affairs, he said to Midget, "If you will come with me, we will kill the dragon."

Now, both Midget and the queen had found that the mouse always told the truth, and when the mouse promised to advise her how to proceed, Midget readily undertook to rid the kingdom of the dragon and his serpents. She started out at sunrise with the mouse upon her shoulder, but instead of wearing his silk necktie, he hid himself under the puff in the shoulder of her dress, where without being seen by any one, he could give advice.

"Knaves, fools and dragons provide the means for their own destruction," said the mouse. "This dragon had stolen an enchanted sword which my friends, its rightful owners, have just recovered. While he had it in his castle he gave it just the temper they needed to cut off his own heads."

Then he told Midget where to find the sword and a ring in which was a wonderful diamond. When the ring was on one's finger, with the stone inside the hand, one could close the fingers over it and no light would be seen, but the instant that the hand was opened, out sprang such a gleam of light that only the strongest eyes could bear it.

With the mouse as a guide, she went along the main approach to the dragon's castle and found the first sentinel, a large serpent who could outrun any giant of the whole kingdom.

On coming to him Midget opened her hand, and he was so blinded that he did not know where to strike or which way to turn. Immediately Midget cut off his head so quickly that he never knew what struck him, and she went on to the second sentinel. He was much larger and had two equally dangerous heads, but when the mouse whispered that the ring would blind thirteen heads as well as one, Midget opened her hand again, and the sentinel appeared to be twice as bewildered and confused as the first. You see, he had two heads to be confused. The heads, in trying to strike for the same point, hit each other so hard as to stun them both, and Midget had ample time to cut them both off.

Now, the mouse had told her that the next sentinel had three heads and that as soon as she had cut off the central one, the other two would be harmless. With this serpent Midget fared as well as with the others, and went bravely on to meet the thirteen-headed dragon.

The mouse had brought a little vial of fine powder, which Midget was to sprinkle over the path at the doorway of the dragon's castle.

After that she was to return to the spot where the three-headed serpent had been stationed, for here, about noon, the dragon came to issue his orders.

A few moments before noon the doors of the dragon's castle opened of their own accord and out came the dragon. He crawled quickly toward the sentinel posts where Midget, hidden behind a large tree, was waiting to receive him, and upon seeing his sentinel with his heads cut off he was so frightened that he turned back toward his castle. Immediately Midget put out her hand from behind the tree, flashed the light in his eyes and so blinded the dragon that for a moment he could not move. The powder which had been sprinkled in his path put him to sleep, and Midget with skillful strokes of the sword cut off his thirteen heads. They passed the dragon's castle and went to the edge of the lake. There the mouse showed Midget a small rocky island and told her that all the serpents excepting the sentinels had gone to this island through a passage at the bottom of the lake, which they had been years in digging.

This rocky island had been used by the serpents as a sort of picnic ground, and there they often staid for a week at a time.

Our friend the mouse knew of all these plans and had led his cousins, uncles and aunts by a secret path to the edge of the lake.

He knew just where the underground passage which the serpents used was placed, and the mice were digging holes to it just at the edge of the lake. Soon a very little removal of the sand would let the water rush in and fill the passage leading to the serpent island. When Midget arrived, the mouse called to his friends that they had dug enough, and Midget, having made a channel from the water to the hole which they dug, flooded the passage. The serpents were thus unable to leave the barren island, and they never troubled the giants again.

The mouse now told Midget to return to the palace, where he would show her and the queen what to do next. The queen summoned the royal guard, numbering 100 of the tallest giants, and ordered them to start against the dragon the next morning. Promptly at 8 o'clock every man came to his place in the ranks, and Midget appeared with the mouse on her shoulder and the magic sword in her hand.

Every giant tried to look brave, but any one could see that they were all frightened nearly out of their senses.

One purposely stepped on a round stone and fell. When he got up he said he had to go to the hospital.

Another said that his father was very sick and asked to be excused.

Now, this man's father had died two years before, so the queen asked him if his father had been sick all of the two years since his death.

The poor fellow was so ashamed to be caught in his falsehood and cowardice that he was never again seen in Giantland.

A third rubbed strawberry juice on his stocking to look as if he was wounded and bleeding. He limped so badly that the queen excused him.

The mouse very politely introduced to the queen and to Midget our friends Jethro and Ruel, with their mother. This was a surprise, as no one had before known that they were in the palace. Five small people in their midst at one time were a disgrace, thought the royal guard, and were it not for their fear of the dragon they would have rebelled and sent their queen, with all of her guests, to the other side of the lake. Before the day was over, however, they learned to court small people, and even a mouse, as of some use in the world.

The queen ordered the captain of the giants to lead his men over the path where Midget adventures had occurred the day before, but when the giants arrived at the first sentinel post, not one of them could be persuaded to meet the serpent. Midget, calling the giants to come and see that he was dead, went ahead and struck the serpent with her sword. This gave them courage, and they went on more bravely. When, however, they came to the two-headed serpent, even Midget waa surprised to find that his heads seemed uninjured and that he looked as much alive as ever.

There was here the same trouble as at the first sentinel post. The queen asked in vain for volunteers; not a giant would go forward. At last the queen called for Midget, and as the mouse had whispered in her ear that his friends had fixed the serpent in this manner, she replied that she would lend her sword to Jethro if he would accept it and meet the serpent.

Now, Jethro, as we know, was only about six feet tall, and, like Midget, was considered by the giants as one who could not be of any good in the world. When he took the sword and went forward, the giants were again surprised, for besides being brave Jethro was very skillful in the use or the sword.

Not knowing that the serpent was already dead, he walked carefully forward to meet him, and with wonderful quickness made a swinging stroke which cut off both heads at the same time. When the serpent's heads were cut off, the giants, of course, began to be more courageous and marched forward again with few misgivings until they came to the third sentinel post. Here, as before, the mouse's friends had fixed the serpent's heads so that they looked wonderfully alive, and the waving motion was accomplished with still more skill than with the other two sentinels. The queen, after calling again for volunteers among the giants, asked Midget whom she should send to destroy the third sentinel.

SEPARATED BY FATE.

A well dressed woman walked into the Crocker building yesterday afternoon and took an elevator. Her husband saw her from across the street, and, hurrying over, took the next elevator. He went up to the office where his wife had business, and found that she had stepped in and out, and gone down the next elevator. The elevator dispatch said to her:—

"Your husband just went up in the elevator. I think he is looking for you."

The lady took the next elevator up. Just then her husband came down. He looked all around, and then inquired of the elevator man:—

"Have you seen my wife here?"

"Yes, she just went up this minute."

The man took the next elevator, and he was no more than out of sight till his wife came down again.

"Your husband has just gone up again," said the elevator man.

"I guess he will wait for me this time so I'll go up." And she went up.

Down came her husband a second afterward.

"Did my wife come down again?" he inquired.

"Yes, and just went up again." She thought you would wait for her."

"Well, I'll wait here."

He waited about five minutes, and then, growing impatient, took an elevator up stairs. She had been waiting for him, and came down again just as he disappeared.

"Well I'll wait for him and catch him this time," said she.

After standing in the corridor several minutes she decided to go up stairs and find him. As she whisked out of sight, he stepped out of another elevator.

"Your wife has gone up," said the elevator man.

The husband swore a little under his breath, and started to leave the building. At the door he hesitated, changed his mind, and took the next elevator up. Down came his wife at the same moment.

"He's just gone up again," was the elevator man's answer to her weary look of inquiry, "and he's mad as a hornet."

"Then I had better go right up and catch him," she said.

Up she went, and down he came.

"Just went up," remarked the elevator man.

"I'm darned if I'm going up again," said he; "I'll wait right here," and he sat down on the stairs. Half an hour later he was still sitting there, and his wife, equally determined, was waiting for him up stairs.—San Fransisco Post.

THE BOY AND THE DUKE.—The duke of Hamilton's harriers hunt during the season in this neighborhood, and the "meet" is a welcome relief from the monotony of rural life. On one of these occasions, not long ago, when the duke himself was present, the services of a bright Suffork youth were requisitioned to hold his grace's horse. The duke addressed some kindly remark to the boy, who promptly replied. "Yes, Sir!" "Why don't you say 'Your grace?" interposed one of the attendant horsemen. "Say 'Your grace,' boy!" Whereupon the youngster reverently put his hands together, and audibly recited the words, "For what we are about to receive," etc.—Gentleman's Magazine.

"Oh, yes, my husband has been a collector of curios and such things for a number of years." "Was he in that business when he married you?" "Yes, indeed." "I thought so."—Wilmington (Del) Star.

A SUGGESTION TO VOTERS.

Our High Tax Rate, and How it Might be Reduced.

At this season, when it is too warm for political discussion, might it not be well, instead of arguing on the merits of the gold or the silver dollar, to consider how dollars of any kind may be saved to the taxpayers? In other words, let us see if the present method of conducting the financial affairs of the town is the best possible.

As it is now and has been from time immemorial, we have endeavored to live up to the old Webster spelling book bit of antiquated wisdom, "Pay as you go." While there is no question but this would be a good policy if we could afford to live up to it, can we afford to live up to it? We build a needed schoolhouse at Thorndike, and to pay for it we assess the expense upon the taxpayers of to-day; the result is increased taxes to the present generation, while those who come after us will reap the benefit of our good deeds and pay nothing.

As a town we need many things if we wish to keep up with the procession. Public buildings, sewers, good roads, etc., etc., must come in the immediate future. Even now we are liable to be called on by the state officials—in fact have been called on—to provide better school facilities in the villages of Palmer and Three Rivers. We may, by patching and repairing, manage to make the present buildings do for a year or two, but to spend much money on the present structures would be a criminal waste. We appropriate each year a certain amount for sewers, and at the present rate of progress in 20 or 30 years the town will have a more or less complete system, but many of the citizens who are paying to-day for this improvement will be in their graves before their property is benefitted.

Now instead of this old-fashioned way of doing business, why not look up new methods? Let us suppose, for instance, we meet face to face the solid fact that we must have here certain improvements if we wish to keep Palmer from being numbered among the backwoods towns. We resolve that we who are living here now shall have the benefit of these good things; that our children who are being educated now shall spend their school hours in clean, well ventilated houses; that we will so manage affairs that it will be possible to own property in Palmer without being burdened with excessive taxation.

Can this be done? It would seem so. Let us find out what is needed; estimate the cost of whatever is wanted to put our town in the front rank of progressive communities, then without hesitation order those things done and bond the town to pay for them. By this method, people who will be receiving the benefit 20 years hence will be obliged to pay their share. We will not be forced to stagger along under a heavy burden of taxation, for having only the interest to meet, with a small sum annually to be set apart as a sinking fund to meet the maturing bonds, would permit a low tax rate.

Taxpayers of Palmer, consider these things. What has been said above is only intended as in the line of suggestion, and the JOURNAL will gladly welcome anything from its readers that will help to an enlightened public sentiment.

Liquor Ordered Forfeited.

No one appeared in the district court Monday to claim the pint of whisky seized on Sunday, June 14th, in the barn over the river in Monson occupied by F. L. Pierce, and it was declared forfeited to the commonwealth.

J. H. Thompson and C. C. Keep of the Monson prosecuting committee testified to the circumstances of the raid and the finding of a pint bottle nearly full of whisky,—which was produced in court,—about a dozen lager bottles in a watering pot full of water, also a large number of empty bottles of various sizes, many of them having a small quantity of liquor in the bottom.

H. R. Heath, in addition to the above, testified that he had seen people going to and from the barn that day; five went there at one time, apparently sober, but when they left an hour later two, a man and a boy, were under the influence of liquor. He had seen people going there on other days, on one occasion the party numbering nine. On May 31st he saw seven men and boys go there apparently sober, but when they left two of the men and one boy were under the influence of liquor. His attention had been called by others to the same state of affairs. Previous to the raid he saw Pierce at the barn, and saw him empty the contents of several bottles into a milk can, which he took away with him; these bottles were afterward found to have whisky in the bottom. On Saturday, the 13th, he saw two kegs of beer or ale taken to the barn; he also overheard a conversation between Pierce and a party of men, in which Pierce said he would put bottles of liquor in certain places in the barn where it couldn't be found, and that it was in one of these places where the bottle seized was secured. At this same time the parties said, regarding the beer, "We'll take care of it tomorrow."

Later in the day Mr. Pierce was arrested, charged with keeping a common nuisance. The case will be tried next Monday, and he was released on $300 bail.

High School Graduating Exercises.

Evidently the members of the senior class of the high school have many friends in town, if the attendance at the opera house last Friday evening to listen to the graduating exercises can be considered as an indication. Every seat in the house was filled, and many were obliged to stand. The stage was prettily decorated with ferns and other greenery, and at one side, in a large frame on an easel, were grouped the pictures of the class. Overhead hung the motto, "Qui non proficit, deficit," in green and white, the class colors. After a selection by the Palmer orchestra W. A. Breckenridge, chairman of the school committee, introduced President Elmer H. Capen of Tufts College, who gave an address on "Influence." After this the class song, written by Miss Ethel H. Ely, was sung by the class. The diplomas were presented by Rev. H. F. Moulton with fitting and appropriate remarks. The exercises closed with the singing of "America" by the audience. The audience was much impressed with the fine appearance that the class made. Immediately after the graduating exercises a reception was given by the class to invited guests. Light refreshments were served and there was dancing, music being furnished by the Palmer orchestra. Every member of the class received their diploma. The following are their names: Alice May Armstrong, Fannie Louise Barnes, Ella Bray, Walter Haran Brown, Helen Converse, Lula Agnes Dillon, Ethel Hayden Ely, Phoebe Daisy Hastings, Ernest Emery Hobson, Charles Ralph LeGro, Ola Mae Northrop, Charles Leo O'Connor, John Francis Roche, William Thomas Sargent, Jeremiah Francis Sugrue.

Living Whist at the Opera House.

The carnival and New Living Whist was presented at the opera house Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. It was given under the direction of Mrs. Anna H. Day of Worcester, and was for the benefit of the Universalist society. Over 100 children and people took part in the dancing and singing. The first part, the carnival, was finely rendered; the sunflowers, maids of the mist, cupids, butterflies, Spainsh gypsies, fairies in their frolic, the vampires and imps all took their parts well, and the dances and movements were very pleasing. The song, "I don't want to play in your yard," was sung so well by Misses Katie Mathews and Dote Flynt that they received an encore. In the second part a regular game of whist was played with persons for the different cards. They were elegantly costumed, and as they were shuffled, cut and dealt,—at the same time dancing to the music of the Palmer orchestra,—they presented a very pleasing appearance. Thirteen tricks were played, and were especially interesting. The whole affair went off very smoothly and reflects much credit upon the skill of the director, Mrs. Day. A fair-sized audience greeted both presentations, but as all the actors were home talent there should have been larger houses both evenings. All who did attend enjoyed it very much. After the performance Wednesday evening a dance was held, and all who took part in the play and those who held reserved seat coupons were allowed to participate. Music was furnished by the Palmer orchestra.

Attempted Theft of a Horse.

A bold attempt was made to steal a horse in this village last Saturday evening. C. F. Orcutt, while attending the choir rehearsal at the Congregational church, left his horse hitched to the fence in front of the horse-sheds. Soon after Mr. Shaw and his wife, who live in that locality, while passing through the sheds saw a man standing near the horse's head. Knowing whose horse it was and thinking that all was not right, Mr. Shaw sent his wife ahead and he remained back out of sight. Upon hearing footsteps the man standing near the horse quickly departed, but upon seeing no one but Mrs. Shaw pass by he returned, accompanied by another man. One of them got into the wagon and the other was about to unhitch the horse when Mr. Shaw made his appearance. Both men quickly departed; neither of them were known to Mr. Shaw. It was fortunate that he happened along at that time, otherwise Mr. Orcutt might now be minus a horse and wagon.

Baseball To-Morrow.

The ball game at the park to-morrow afternoon between the clerks and a nine from the high school promises to be one of unusual interest. The clerks have been practicing every night under Capt. The game will be called promptly at 2:30; no admission will be charged. The following, with one or two possible exceptions, will be the make-up of the teams:

He leaves one son, Lewis, who lives at home, and three daughters, Georgianna, wife of E. E. Ryther of Bondsville, Clara, wife of Lewis Holmes, and Ida, wife of William Holbridge. MURPHY—LYNCH.

The marriage of John Murphy and Mrs. Bessie Lynch took place here on Saturday at the parochial residence, Rev. F. J. Lynch officiating. The bride wore a dress of brown novelty goods, with trimmings to match. The bridesmaid, Miss Hannah Ford, a sister of the bride, wore a gown of gray novelty with trimmings of the same material. The best man was Thomas Murphy, a brother of the groom. After the ceremony a reception was given by the married couple to the friends of both families only at the home of Mrs. Daniel Sullivan on Church street.

M'CARTHY—CARROLL.

Thorndike has been the scene of an unusual number of pretty weddings this week, but none attracted more attention than the wedding of William Carroll of Holyoke, formerly of this place, and Miss Katherine McCarthy, a popular and well-known young woman, and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCarthy, one of the oldest families of the place. The ceremony occurred at St. Mary's Catholic church on Monday at noon, and was performed by the pastor of the church, Rev. Francis J. Lynch. The church was well filled by the many friends of the bride and groom. The bride and best man entered the church followed by the bridesmaid and groom. They were met at the altar by the officiating clergyman, and the impressive ring service was performed. The bride was handsomely gowned in white mousseline de soie, trimmed with chiffon and lilies of the valley, and carried a bouquet of bride roses. The bridesmaid, Miss Bessie V. McCarthy, sister of the bride, wore a gown of white organdie over pale blue silk, and carried a bouquet of Katherine roses. The best man was Michael Lyons of Springfield. After the ceremony a reception and dinner was given at the home of the bride's parents, which was attended by relatives and a few near friends. The couple left on the 3.17 p. m. train for Boston, carrying with them the best wishes of many friends here. Upon their return they will be at home to their friends at 163 Elm street, Holyoke. The bride's travelling suit was a gray novelty, with hat to match.

HABITS.

Some Have Them and Others are Not Without.

A man likes some hot drink for breakfast, and coffee suits his taste about as well as anything. It seems hard that so many should be denied coffee because it upsets their liver and disagrees with them in one way and another, still this condition does exist, and when a man finds it hurts him, he is generally sensible enough to leave it out of his bill of fare, for it is quite a bit pleasanter to feel well all day than to enjoy a drug two or three minutes and pay for it in aches and ails or sickness.

A new breakfast drink has come into use, difficult to tell from coffee, but made entirely of grains and which never produces any disagreeable results. It has the clean, pungent flavor so much enjoyed in coffee, but while coffee hurts the system Postum Cereal goes to work in downright good earnest to "make red blood."

It is composed only of the grains intended by nature for man's subsistence. These are skillfully blended and prepared in such a way as to produce a hot drink the fac-simile of rich Mocha or Java coffee, but fattening and healthful. Stomach, liver and bowel troubles disappear when coffee and tea are left off and the food drink, Postum, taken in their place.

This toothsome drink goes about three times as far as coffee, and produces health and comfort where trouble formerly existed. It is made by the Postum Cereal Co. Lim., of Battle Creek, Mich. When a man or woman "feels mean" day after day or every few days, it can quite safely be charged to incorrect habits, and coffee and tea drinking are the real cause of more bodily disorder than any one knows. A habit is hard to get over, but when a delicious tasting article is offered which produces health instead of tearing it down, the change is easy to make. Prominent grocers say it exactly meets a want, and persons who have been kept from coffee on account of their health are now having all the enjoyment of coffee drinking and getting fat over it.

"Just as good" as Postum Cereal are words used to defraud the public.

OLD DAYS RECALLED.

By William King, a Descendant from One of Monson's Earliest Settlers.

One of Monson's best known citizens is William King. His short, well-rounded figure, his smiling face, his brisk walk and his jovial manner are familiar to all. He has lived more than 75 years, and his knowledge of the town and its people is as great, probably, as that of anyone living, for not only has the most of his life been spent here, but that of his father and grandfather. Mr. King has recently paid a visit to the farm on Sand Hill which was the family home. He was accompanied by his three daughters, Mrs. J. V. Squier of Hartford, Mrs. C. M. Pease and Mrs. W. K. Flynt. Together they talked over family history, which means Monson history, and while it was fresh in Mr. King's mind he related a most interesting story to a JOURNAL representative.

Mr. King's grandfather, William King, 1st, settled on what is now known as the Callahan farm in 1760, two years before the town was set off from Brimfield and named. Since this time he or his descendants have paid taxes and voted every year. Grandfather William came to Monson with his young wife, Hannah Lanphear, from Norwich, Ct. The two with all their worldly possessions entered the town on horseback, but when Mr. King died he left a large property. The couple went to housekeeping in a little old red house with but two rooms and a pantry. As their family increased, and their fortunes also, a large gambrel roofed house was built, containing several rooms, all of which were 16 by 16 feet in size, and grouped about an immense chimney. There were two large ovens in the house, and Grandson William tells of the bread his grandmother Hannah baked in those ovens. He recalls the oven shovel, on which the dough was placed and then tossed into the oven, the beautiful brown of these loaves of bread and their fine quality; no bread of modern times equals that, he says.

Mr. King was the collector of taxes for a number of years. Money was scarce, and he found collecting hard work. He had a neighbor of whom it was particularly difficult to get money. Finally this neighbor said, "Well, William, you will have to sell my 14-acre wood lot at auction for the money." This Mr. King was loath to do, but it seemed to be necessary. Accordingly he advertised it, and was himself the auctioneer. It was at that time lawful for the auctioneer to make one bid; finally, as no one else made a bid, he said: "I will give a pistarine (20 cts.) an acre for it." And as no one raised the bid he struck off the wood-lot to himself. As $2.80 did not cover the tax bill, the poor man offered to trade off his large yoke of oxen for a smaller one to Mr. King, and this settled the case.

It was customary in those times to give a stock note instead of money, and each spring turn over to the holder of the note stock enough to cover the indebtedness. If the value of the stock could not be agreed upon between the people concerned, three disinterested men were asked to appraise it, and this decision was regarded as final.

Colonel Rice Munn, who was the first town clerk, and ancestor of Lavater S. Munn of Springfield and of Rice Munn Reynolds and Theodore Reynolds, was a special friend of William King, and these men, fired with patriotism when Daniel Shay marched upon Springfield, saddled their horses and rode at a furious rate to do what they could to help the Springfield citizens defend themselves against the rebel. Mr. King was a Revolutionary soldier, but Grandson William does not recall having heard much told concerning the war. William, the elder, as was said, amassed quite a large fortune, and it was done largely through the manufacture and sale of potash. Wood was exceedingly cheap in those days, a large load bringing but 50 cents at the most. In the fall Mr. King would lay in a supply of groceries and provisions of all kinds. These he sold to his neighbors, taking his pay in wood ashes, which he and his sons converted into potash. They also made the barrels into which it was put. In the course of a winter they were able to produce from 6 to 8 tons of potash, which in the spring was drawn by means of oxen to Norwich, 40 miles away, where it brought $100 a ton. He is recalled as having been sharp at a trade, though advising his sons to avoid trading if possible; but if they found it necessary to trade, to look out for No 1. When he died his son Amasa settled the property; when Amasa died his property was settled by his son Dwight, and Dwight's son, Henry A. of Springfield, now has an account book kept by these two men which is said to be a curiosity. When in 1811 the North Monson mill which is now the property of the Monson Woolen Company was built, it is recalled by Grandson William that William the elder said the town was called to assist at the "raising." It was a great day for the town, for it showed that there was a prospect of a large business. To be sure it was a disappointment to the early settlers that the business should be so far from the part of the town which they had laid out as the center,—a broad avenue in the range of hills east of the present village,—but they were willing to sacrifice their personal feelings for the sake of business.

When William's son Amasa had married Zuba Lewis of Brimfield and settled on the old homestead, grandfather William, with his other nine children, went to Palmer to live for a time. He returned to Monson however, leaving his son John to found the Palmer branch of the family. The Kings are connected through marriage with many other prominent Monson families. Of William the eldest's grandchildren only the present William survives, he being the son of Amasa. The name of Samuel King is a familiar one, and it was at his house that Monson's first town meeting was held. He was a member of the Brimfield King family, and not related to the Monson family. At the old homestead the ten children of William and the eight children of Amasa were born, of which William the 2d is the only survivor. His four children were also born there, the three daughters above mentioned and Fred W. King of Chicopee. William 2d tore down the old house in '56, but on the original cellar built another. After he removed to the village about 25 years ago and the property was owned by Mr. Pendergast, the house was burned, and in it Mr. and Mrs. Pendergast lost their lives. The King family has ever been prominent in the affairs of the town. The men have held town offices as well as those of state, the present representative of of the 9th Hampden district being Charles W. King.

An 80th Birthday Celebration.

On Monday Mrs. Emily Delia Bugbee of Green street celebrated her 80th birthday, receiving many remembrances in the way of booklets, letters and flowers. Her son's wife, Mrs. H. E. Bugbee, gave a family dinner party in her honor. The dining room was tastefully decorated with ferns and daisies. Mrs. Bugbee lives with her daughter, Mrs. C. O. Chapin, and in the home with her son. She has no other children living. Mrs. Bugbee, born Smith, is a native of Stafford, Ct. She married Elijah Bugbee in 1833; he died in 1865. Mrs. Bugbee removed to Monson in 1867, and her life has been a remarkably active and useful one. She is still wearing the first and only pair of glasses she has ever owned, which were bought when she was 50 years old. Her mother, who died at the age of 91, put on glasses when she was but 30 years old, and continued to wear the same pair as long as she lived. Mrs. Bugbee is a very devout woman, being a member of the Congregational church. Although she has but one grandchild, Harry Winter Bugbee, she is known as "Grandma" to all the children of her acquaintance.

Death of Levi C. Chandler, a Former Monson Resident.

He was taken into the house and expired almost immediately. Mr. Chandler was born in Springfield, Mass., Jan. 5, 1828 At the age of 17 he came to Monson to learn the blacksmith's trade. He was married Nov. 3, 1752, to Mary M., oldest daughter of the late Foster Pepper of Monson. The result of this marriage was three sons. The oldest, L. Samuel, died Jan. 28, 1867. Mr. Chandler remained in Monson 28 years, and in September, 1872, went to Fitzwilliam, entering the employ of W. N. Flynt & Co. Can any one explain the cause of the quince blight? Quince growers are feeling much disappointed over the poor prospect of a crop. The bushes blossomed freely, and there was every reason to believe that there would be a good yield of fruit, when the leaves began to turn brown and the fruit to fall off.

To-morrow promises to be an uneventful Fourth in Monson with the exception of the picnic of St. Patrick's parish on Flynt park. There will be a baseball game on the park between the Monsons and the West Warrens at 10 a. m., and the usual sports during the day. The Monson Cornet Band will be in attendance.

The lawn party given at the Methodist parsonage last Friday evening by the Young Women's Missionary Band drew out a large crowd; it even rivaled the merry-go-round. The Monson Cornet Band gave a pleasing concert. A tent had been erected, and under it the tables were set. The lawn was lighted by Japanese lanterns with pretty effect. The society netted a goodly sum.

Rev. Harry Blackford received news Saturday morning that his young brother, living in El Dorado, Ohio, had been short in the face while camping out near his home, and seriously hurt. Miss Lenore Blackford, a sister, who has been spending some time in Monson, left for home in the afternoon. A gang of men is engaged in cutting back the terrace on the east side of the Thompson extension of the Center cemetery, and filling in North Main street according to the grade recently established by the county commissioners. The bank wall which is to be given by the Cyrus W. Holmes heirs will be begun at once, and will be finished in two or three weeks. The W. N. Flynt Granite Company has the contract. Sanford Fuller and sister of Springfield were in town last week, and Mr. Fuller left a sum of money to be used in beautifying the cemetery. The grounds are looking well, which is very gratifying to the townspeople.

The Origin of Children's Day.

Editor of the Palmer Journal:—

DEAR SIR:—Will you give me opportunity through the columns of your paper of making known to the Monson readers of the JOURNAL the reason for my statement at the Children's Day exersises in the Methodist church June 21st: A statement to the effect that the Methodist church originated Children's Day observance in an official capacity? Some of my people had questioned the accuracy of this remark, from remarks which they have heard elsewhere. The question is, who originated Children's Day? Children's Day has grown to great proportions in almost every denomination at the present time. Almost every denomination has now come to utilize the idea and to observe the day by some special exercises. As is always the case with movements that attain to larger success, the question of origin is constantly proposed, an answer to my inquiring friends in regards to the origin of this day, I present what I believe to be the facts involved. It is not a question which individual minister or individual church first observed "Flower Sunday" or Floral Sunday" or "Rose Sunday."

A Sabbath day having some special reference to the children appears to have been observed by individual ministers and churches several years before the movement took definite form or was acted upon by any general ecclesiastical organization. Ministers of various denominations acting independently in their individual Sunday school gave some special attention to the children. Naturally in the spring of the year the Sunday school which is over a hundred years old would have exercises which they could appropriately call "Rose Sunday" or "Floral Sunday," and doubtless in this independent form the practice obtained for many years in all the churches, certainly in the Universalist and Methodist churches. The baptism of children constituted a part of the service. But the day had no other formally expressed significance or purpose, and was not known as Children's Day. The very first service of this kind, this independent kind, I mean, known to us in which the children were asked to make a contribution for a given object, was in the Methodist church at Merchantville, N. J. And I say without fear of successful contradiction that the first denomination of Christians acting in a representative capacity that recommended and adopted Children's Day proper was the Methodist church. Its real origin as now observed by us and others was in the committee appointed by the general conference of our church in 1864 to prepare for the celebration of the "Centenary of Methodist" in this country, which was to occur in 1866. A large central committee of 24 members was appointed, and this committee appointed a special committee of six persons. The members of this committee were Dr. John McClintock, Dr. Daniel Curry, Dr. Geo. R. Croods, Oliver Hoyt, James Bishop and C. C. North, to whom belong the honor of devising a plan to raise a "Children's Fund," and as a part of this plan to observe a "Children's Day." No denomination had taken any official action on this subject up to this time. The Universalist general convention of 1867 recommended the observance of the second Sunday in June as a day for the baptism of children. This same body also adopted another recommendation to the same effect in September of the year 1868, and in 1870 strengthened the resolution by making it "the duty" of every person to set apart a Sunday for this purpose. I get these dates from the Board of Education. It will be seen then from these statements of fact, that the official action of our "central committee," acting for the denomination, proceeds that of the Universalist official action by some two years. Again, it will be observed that the objects contemplated by the Universalists and by the Methodists differ essentially, the Methodist church having a much more comprehensive scope and purpose of observing Children's Day; something more than a "floral Sunday" or "a day for baptizing children."

In historic order as this original ground for establishing the day, the raising of a "children's fund" with which to aid meritorious young people from our Sunday schools in securing a higher education, the bringing of all the children and youth of Methodism under the inspiring and educating influence of a common service that shall make them more intelligent Christians. These objects are noble and worthy and ought never to be lost sight of in the observance of this "Pearl of Days;" especially should no Methodist Sunday school forget this original purpose of the day.

As to individual ministers and churches, a sporadic observance of a day as the interests of children, no denomination can properly claim precedence. The Universalists probably have as good a claim as any other church, and the same can be said of the Methodist. But we affirm again and the above is a reason for this affirmation, in the fundamental idea embraced in Children's Day and acted on officially by any representative body of Christians the Methodist church has the priority; and as to Children's Day proper, including the objects sought of the Methodist Episcopal church, no other denomination disputes the ground. It is distinctly a Methodist institution.

About seventy invitations were issued, and included the children throughout the town between the ages of 5 and 8 years. By special permission the party was held on the town park, which formed a beautiful setting for the little people in their festivities. Seldom is a more charming sight witnessed than that of the children playing games on the grass and walking up and down the broad walks of the park. Two misses in their teans, Carrie Parker and Sophie Converse, were present to direct the games and make the children from different parts of the town acquainted with one another. Some grown-up people were favored with invitations from the little hostess, and Mr. and Mrs. LeGro of Palmer with two children were in attendance, also little Miss Flynt of Wales. Refreshments, consisting of sandwiches, cake and ice cream, were served under the trees, and each child carried home a bonbon souvenir. Appropriation for a State Highway.

The town is rejoicing over the fact that the state highway commission has awarded the town $9000 for a state highway. The money will be expended on the road from the watering trough at West Warren toward Warren for one mile, and the balance will probably be expended in grading the road from West Warren toward the Palmer line.

Marvelous Results.

From a letter written by Rev. J. Gunderman of Dimondale, Mich., we are permitted to make this extract: "I have no hesitation in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery, as the results were almost marvelous in the case of my wife. While I was pastor of the Baptist church at the Rives Junction she was brought down with pneumonia succeeding la grippe. Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little interruption, and it seemed as if she could not survive them. A friend recommended Dr. King's New Discovery; it was quick in its work and highly satisfactory in results." Trial bottles free of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware. Regular size 50c and $1.

Always in season, Hopkins' Steamed Hominy (Hulled Corn). Elegant lunch inmilk. Qt. can, 10c.

Mrs. Rhodie Noah, of this place, was taken in the night with cramping pains and the next day diarrhoea set in. She took half a bottle of blackberry cordial but got no relief. She then sent to me to see if I had anything that would help her. I sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and the first dose relieved her. Another of our neighbors had been sick for about a week and had tried different remedies for diarrhoea but kept getting worse. I sent him this same remedy. Only four doses of it were required to cure him. He says he owes his recovery to this wonderful remedy.—Mrs. Mary Sibley, Sidney, Mich. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Last summer one of our grandchildren was sick with a severe bowel trouble. Our doctor's remedies had failed, then we tried Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Dirrahoea Remedy, which gave very speedy relief. We regard it as the best medicine ever put on the market for bowel complaints.—Mrs. E. G. Gregory, Fredericktown, Mo. This certainly is the best medicine ever put on the market for dysentery, summer complaint, colic and cholera infantum in children. It never fails to give prompt relief when used in reasonable time and the plain printed directions are followed. Many mothers have expressed their sincere gratitude for the cures it has effected. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Young mothers dread the summer months on account of the great mortality among children caused by bowel troubles. Perfect safety may be assured those who keep on hand DeWitt's Colic and Cholera cure, and administer it promptly. For cramps, bilious colic, dysentery and diarrhoea, it affords instant relief. LeGro & Lynde.

"I have never had a day's sickness in my life," said a middle-aged man the other day. "What a comfort it would be," sighs some poor invalid, "to be in his place for a year or two." Yet half of the invalids we see might be just as healthy as he, if they would only take proper care of themselves, eat proper food—and digest it.

It's so strange that such simple things are overlooked by those who want health.

Food makes health.

It makes strength—and strength wards off sickness. The man who had never been sick was strong because he always digested his food, and you could become the same by helping your stomach to work as well as his. Shaker Digestive Cordial will help your stomach and will make you strong and healthy by making the food you eat make you fat.

for them not to give you Pearline for your washing. Your folks can't know much about it. My! They could save their money, and all your hard work besides. I'm thankful the lady I live with is just the other way. She knows what Pearline will do, and she wants it. She'd never let me lose my time trying to get things clean with soap—and she wouldn't stand it to have her clothes all worn out with rubbing, either." That's the truth. The Duel.

The gingham dog and the calico cat
Side by side at the table sat;
'Twas half-past twelve, and what do you think!
Neither of them had slept a wink!
And the old Dutch clock and Chinese plate
Seemed to know, as sure as fate,
There was going to be an awful spat.

(I wasn't there—I simply state
What was told to me by the Chinese plate.)

The gingham dog went "bow-wow-wow!"
And the calico cat replied "me-ow!"
And the air was streaked for an hour or so
With fragments of gingham and calico,
While the old Dutch clock in the chimney place
Up with his hands before its face,
For it always dreaded a family row.

("Now mind, I'm simply telling you
What the old Dutch clock declares is true.)

The Chinese plate looked very blue
And wailed, "Oh, dear! what shall we do!"
But the gingham dog and the calico cat
Wallowed this way and tumbled that,
And utilized every tooth and claw
In the awfullest way you ever saw—
And, oh! how the gingham and calico flew!

(Don't think that I exaggerate—
I got my news from the Chinese plate.)

Next morning where the two had sat,
They found no trace of the dog or cat;
And some folks think unto this day
That burglars stole that pair away;
But the truth about that cat and pup
Is that they ate each other up—
Now, what do you really think of that?

(The old Dutch clock, it told me so,
And that is how I came to know.)

HE CAUGHT AT A STRAW.

And Found a Bulwark of Strength and Safety.

C. B. Downs, of the freight department of the Boston & Maine Railroad at Portsmouth, knows what it is to suffer from hunger with food within reach, which he could eat, but not digest. He lives at 39 Daniel Street, and tells his experience in the following words:—

When I was 14 years old I began to be troubled with indigestion, which as I grew up became worse instead of better, until I found it hard to keep any food on my stomach. Everything I ate caused me pain and distress, but I did not look like a dyspeptic and so did not get much sympathy.

I tried as many as a dozen different things, but they all failed to cure me, and like a drowning man I was ready to catch at any straw offering the least hope of rescue. Then I tried Puritana and was not only relieved by it from the pain, but in a short time completely cured of my indigestion. I could eat sausages without their hurting me, and I found that Puritana had given me a new stomach that would digest any food. I believe that I was the first person in

TO MISERY

Portsmouth to use Puritana, but not the last, as I know that since then many people have taken it, with wonderful results.

James H. Crowley, of Concord, N. H., is not only an athlete but one of the fastest amateur runners in the State. What he says below shows how a man's strength will go if the stomach is not right.

I had dyspepsia for years. Sometimes I could hardly stand up, and I could not eat anything without pain and agony. Of course I tried to get relief, but met with failure after failure until there seemed to be no hope left. At last I was persuaded to give Puritana a trial. The result was marvelous. It not only relieved me, but it made me perfectly well. Instead of being doubled up with pain, Puritana has given me a stomach like an ostrich, that will digest almost anything. There is nothing too strong for me to say in favor of Puritana.

A Song of Time.

Weep not for the hereafter—
The burden of the years;
For Time stays not for laughter,
And Times stays not for tears.

On swiftest pinions flying
He speeds o'er land and sea;
Shall roses dead or dying
Revive because of thee?

Care not for sharp thorns springing;
To thee be life complete;
If any bird is singing,
And any rose is sweet.

What ill may come hereafter
Will come despite thy fears;
Time lingers not for laughter,
And Time stays not for tears.

THE MULE OUT-KICKED.

One of the tales of the frontier which the St. Louis Globe-Democrat preserves for its readers comes to it from a Colorado correspondent. He says that in the days of the San Gabriel canyon mining boom in the 70s a large-boned and gigantic Indianian was known to his rough but kindly associates as "Kicking Tom." He had won the nickname by reason of the terrific force with which he could launch his great, sinewy foot against an opposing object. He was, besides, as lithe and springy as a panther. In those days men were not very particular about the character of their amusement, although nothing mean or underhanded took place among them. Their rough courtesy was genuine and hearty, and they were as brave as Norman barons or Paladins of France. They at times had little regard for human life, but in their deadly affrays they took the lion and not the hyena for their model. They admired courage and strength, because these were qualities which came every day into requisition, and without them there was neither peace nor safety in the then lawless realm of the gold seekers.

Among these pioneers of the wilderness Kicking Tom had grown into universal popularity. He was generous, brave and kindly, and, what perhaps endeared him to his associates more than anything else, he was always foremost in the rough sports of the camp. He was ever ready for fun and frolic, and it was a matter of supreme indifference to him whether this took the form of pleasant episodes or rough fighting. He exemplified the old adage that "it is just as good to fight as to eat." One day a miner brought into camp a Mexican burro which soon obtained a wide celebration as a vicious animal, who when excited would attack man or beast with desperate fury. Several mountain ponies had been kicked to death by him, and more than one man had nearly lost his life by the savage heels of the brute. So exciting had become the record of the jack's achievements that they became the subject of universal conversation and inquiry among the miners. Sitting in their cabins they spun wonderful tales of what he had done and what he was doing.

"He is the liveliest kicker going," said one.

"You are right, old man. The beast can kick the hair off a man's head without touching the skin," replied one of his companions.

That was touching Tom in a tender place and, after a moment's reflection, he spoke up with the remark:

"He can't kick me." The observation was received with amazed silence.

"Lord, Tom! Why, he'd make mince meat of you in a minute."

"Would he?" replied the athletic Indianian. "Then he can have the chance. I'm ready to kick for $100, and may the best man win."

"Or the best jack," interposed a companion.

"I mean what I say, old man, so don't be too spry with your tongue." And Tom's brow lowered in gathering anger. His friends apologized for the jest, and the crowd dispersed.

The next day the rumor went wild through the camp that Tom was willing to kick the burro for a wager. In the dusk of the evening the miners gathered in from their work and discussed the subject in all its bearings. Opinions as to the match was about evenly divided. If anything, Tom was the favorite. Under these circumstances a mill for $100 a side was easily arranged between the beast and the man, and it were decided that the conflict should come off the next Sunday afternoon.

Promptly at the appointed hour every inhabitant of the canyon and the villages that have since grown into Pomone and Pasadena were assembled in a little level spot just outside the limits of the camp. The preliminaries were quickly arranged and the fight began.

The beast seemed to take in the situation at a glance, and, laying back his ears, he watched his wary opponent with angry eyes. Suddenly Tom leaped forward and landed a terrific kick squarely on the junction of the neck and head. The brute reeled before the force of the blow, but recovering on the instant, he wheeled and launched both heels at his antagonist. The man leaped aside, and as quick as lightning responded with another fearful kick on the burro's neck. And so the conflict raged. Sometimes the jack would get in a savage blow on his opponent, but oftener the man had the best of it; and at last, putting forth all of his wonderful strength, he landed a kick with the fury and irresistible force of a pile-driver on the jack's neck, which had been his objective point from the beginning. The beast reeled back, and with a convulsive quiver fell over. Tom was terribly bruised, but no bones were broken, and in a few days he was as spry as ever.

The miners next day gave the jack a regular funeral. Amid all the pomp and circumstance of the camp he was laid to rest underneath the sod of the valley, and a local poet thus canonized his memory:

Lay his waxen hoofs together,
Fold back his long and spreading ears,
For he has gone to blend his heehaw
With the music of the spheres.

DIAGNOSIS FROM A GLASS EYE.—Dr. McMullin tells the following story on himself. A railroad man, occupying a responsible position on one of the great lines, was riding on a train one day when a collision occurred and his car was knocked into smithereens. He was picked up as one dead and was stretched out in some convenient place to await the arrival of a doctor to pronounce officially upon his condition. Dr. McMullin, who was then in his first year at Jefferson college, was on the same train. He bustled up, looked at the motionless form and pallid face of the prostrate official, and said: "The poor fellow's a goner, I guess." Then the embryo physician knelt down, lifted up an eyelid, and saw a dull, expressionless orb. "Yes," he's dead fast enough. Take him away," said he. The supposed corpse suddenly began to move his lips. The startled McMullin listened, and this is what he heard: "You blanked fool, that's my glass eye."—Philadelphia Record.

Electric Bitters.

Electric Bitters is a medicine suited for any season, but perhaps more generally needed when the exhausted feeling prevails, when the liver is torpid and sluggish and the need of a tonic and alterative is felt. A prompt use of this medicine has often averted long and perhaps bilious fevers. No medicine will act more surely in counteracting and freeing the system from the malarial poison. Headache, indigestion, constipation, dizziness yield to Electric Bitters. 50c and $1 per bottle of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

SHAKERS ON BIKES.

There is no doubt that Achilles, in "Troilus and Cressida," traveled on a bicycle, for he says to his myrmidons:—

Attend to me while I wheel.

It is safe to assume that, as to-day the wheel is a never-ending source of conversation, so was it at the time of Titus Andronicus, though the listener was more patient then. Aron says to Demetrius:—

Now talk at pleasure of your safety.

It appears from a quotation made by the king in "All's Well That Ends Well" that the law required lamps to be carried at night, and that a violation of it was followed by death. He says:—

Let me live after my flame lacks oil.

Chains were not noiseless, and bells were used in the days of the "Comedy of Errors," as shown by a conversation between the Dromio of Syracuse, and Adriana, which runs thus:—

A chain, a chain,—do you not hear it?
What, the chain?
No, no; the bell.

The availibility of wheels in dangerous service is illustrated in "Coriolanus," when the winded messenger says to Comenius:—

Spies of the Volsces
Held me in chase, that I was forced to wheel
Three or four miles about; else had I, sir,
Half an hour since brought my report.

The tire of which Shakespeare wrote was evidently filled with hair, instead of air, and even its color was of importance. In "Much Ado About Nothing," Margaret says:—

I like the new tire within excellently, if the hair were a thought browner.

Puck's prophetic remark about placing a girdle around the world in 40 minutes is fully equalled by that of Launce, in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," when he says:—

Then may I set the world on wheel's
Surely this prophecy has been fulfilled.—Washington Post

St. Michael the Weigher.

Stood the tall Archangel weighing
All man's dreaming, doing, saying,
All the failure and the pain,
All the triumph and the gain,
In the unimagined years,
Full of hope, more full of tears,
Since old Adam's hopeless eyes
Backward searched for Paradise,
And, instead, the flame-blade saw
Of inexorable Law.

Waking, I beheld him there,
With his fire-gold, flickering hair,
In his binding armor stand,
And the scales were in his hand.
Mighty were, and full well
They could poise both heaven and hell.

"Angel," asked I humbly then,
"Weighest thou the souls of men?
That thine office is, I know."
"Nay," he answered me, "not so;
But I weigh the hope of man
Since the power of choice began,
In the world of good or ill."
Then I waited and was still.

In one scale I saw him place
All the glories of our race,
Cups that lit Belshazzar's feast,
Gems, the lightning of the East,
Kubla's sceptre, Caesar's sword,
Many a poet's golden word,
Many a skill of science, vain
To make men as gods again.

In the other scale he threw
Things regardless, outcast, few,
Martyr-ash, arena sand,
Of St. Francis' cord a strand,
Beechen cups of men whose need
Fasted that the poor might feed,
Disillusions and despairs
Of young saints with grief-grayed hairs,
Broken hearts that broke for Man.

Marvel through my pulses ran
Seeing then the beam divine
Swiftly on the hand decline,
While Earth's splendor and renown
Mounted light as thistledown.

THE POOR OLD MAN.

An elderly man, shabbily attired, was seen walking through one of the fashionable streets of a large city one cold December day. His coat was of a coarse gray and had evidently seen hard service. The traveler walked slowly along, examining carefully, as he passed, the names on the different doorplates. He finally paused before a dwelling of showy exterior, which if we may credit the testimony of the plate upon the door, was occupied by Mr. Alexander Beaumont.

"Alexander Beaumont! Yes, that's the name," murmured the traveler to himself as he ascended the steps and rang the doorbell.

His summons was answered by a footman, who, after a moment's scrutiny, said roughly, "Well, what do you want?"

"Is Mr. Beaumont at home?" asked the old man, without heeding the intentional rudeness.

"No; he is not."

"Then perhaps I can see his wife?"

"I think it very doubtful; but I will go and see."

The servant withdrew without asking the old man to enter, although the day was very cold, and his clothing seemed to be hardly sufficient to protect him from its inclemency.

Mrs. Beaumont was reclining on a sofa in a room handsomely furnished. The last new magazine was in her hand, and her eyes were listlessly glancing over its pages. She was interrupted in her reading by the entrance of the servant.

"Well, what now?" she inquired.

"There is a man down stairs who wants to see you, ma'am."

"Man! A gentleman, you mean?"

"No, ma'am," said Charles stoutly; "it isn't a gentleman at all, for he has got on an old gray coat, and he has not got any gloves on."

"You didn't show him into the parlor, did you?"

The man shook his head.

"You did right, and you had better tell him I'm not at home."

"Mrs. Beaumont is not at home," said Charles, reappearing at the door.

"I suppose that means she is engaged," said the old man. "I think she will see me when she learns who I am. Tell her I am her husband's uncle, and my name is Henry Beaumont."

The man servant returned and delivered the message.

"Good heavens!" said the mistress, "it isn't that old fellow who strolled off years ago, nobody knows where. I did hope he never would come back again. And now I suppose he is as poor as a rat and wants help. Well, he won't get it if I can help it, but I suppose I must see him."

She descended the stairs and received the old man at the door.

"Are you Mrs. Beaumont?" he inquired.

"Yes. I am the wife of Mr. Beaumont, and I suppose from your language you are"—

"His uncle Henry! Ah me! I have been gone so many years, and it does me good to return to my kindred."

The old man's features worked convulsively as thoughts of the past came over his mind. Mrs. Beaumont stood holding the door, as if waiting for him to depart. She did not give him any invitation to enter.

"Is your husband well?" inquired the visitor, looking in as if he expected an invitation to enter and refresh himself.

"He is. If you have any message for him you may leave it with me, and I will deliver it," said Mrs. Beaumont.

"You may tell him I have called," said the visitor in a disappointed tone, "and that I would have liked to have seen him."

"I will tell him," said the lady, as she was about to close the door.

"Hold! There is one question more. What has become of Alexander's sister Anna?"

"I don't know much about her," was the rather disdainful reply; "but I think she married a clerk or some such person. His name is Lowe, and he lives in Norton street. Is that all?"

"That is all."

The old man turned his steps toward the street indicated with many forebodings lest his second visit might be as unwelcomed as the first.

"Charles," said Mrs. Beaumont as she closed the door, "if that old man comes again be sure and not forget to tell him I am not at home."

Norton street was not a fashionable street, nor was the two-story dwelling occupied by William Lowe either handsome or costly. It was marked, however, by an air of neatness which indicated that its tenants were not regardless of outward appearance.

We will take the liberty of introducing the reader to a little sitting room, where Mrs. Lowe and her three children were seated. The furniture, though of a kind that would hardly be selected for a drawing room, had a comfortable, homelike appearance, which amply satisfied the desire of those who derived their happiness from a higher and less mutable force than outside show. Mrs. Lowe was engaged in an employment which is tabooed in all fashionable society—that is, darning stockings.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

MIDGET AND THE DRAGON.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER III.

Now Ruel, although fully a year younger than Jethro, lacked nothing in courage, so to test him Midget offered her sword and asked him to meet the serpent. Having accepted it promptly, he waited an instant until the heads were still, then springing nimbly over them he turned in the air in time to bring the sword down across two of the heads before his feet touched the ground. Like lightning a second blow cut off the third head.

By this time the giants had begun to have a remarkable admiration for small people and to believe that possibly even mice might be of some account, but although they had seen the sentinel thus disposed of, they still quaked with fear, for the royal thirteen-headed dragon must soon be met, and they expected that it would be at a point where only one person could get near him at a time.

Midget placed the central head upon her sword.

The friends of our mouse had certainly done well with the three-headed serpent, but with the dragon the utmost skill had been shown, and there he was, apparently as much alive as ever, with all his heads waving in the air. In some cunning manner the mice had arranged threads so as to open the jaws and dart out the fangs.

At this awful sight every one of the giants ran for his life, leaving our friends and the queen to meet the danger alone. Midget easily cut off the dragon's heads, and placing the central one upon her sword point, went with the queen to rally the giants.

The giants were nearly as proud of their fine uniforms and long gloves, their highly polished helmets and silk tassels, as they height.

It was in this splendid uniform that they always went to march, and it was the same for battle as it was for dress parade.

When they ran in such fear, however, they all rushed for the narrow place in the road, and in their haste upset one another so that before they knew what had happened they were sprawling in the black mud of the brook beside the path.

Now, every one of the royal guard despised a ragged, a poorly dressed, or a dirty looking soldier, and to have to pick themselves up from the bed of the brook with their clothes ten times as black as those of a coal miner, was a disgrace.

Just then the swamp seemed to be full of merry laughter and sweet music. Before they knew it the giants were all laughing at each other, and with their vanity so easily destroyed they were ready to recognize the worth of others. The giants, although they had always despised small people, no sooner saw Midget and her companions than they began to cheer and shout until they were fairly hoarse. Their admiration of the queen knew no bounds, and instead of saying to each other confidentially, "Too bad she is so small as not to amount to anything," they begun to speak of her grace and beauty.

Midget told them that the mice had attended to the serpents and had shut them out as prisoners on the rocky island, and when all had returned to the palace the queen ordered a great feast to be given early the next week, with special invitation to Mr. Bigun to return to Giantland and meet his family.

This surprised him so much that again he consulted the fool bird, but knowing that his head was unsafe on account of the mischief which he had already done, this bird, who was nicknamed Gossip, and sometimes called Envy, tried for once to tell the truth and said:

"Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!
For you 'tis joy, for me 'tis woe;
Size is not all that counts for worth,
For little folks now rule the earth.
Your wife and sons in Giantland
In high esteem now surely stand.
They've won renown despite their size,
And I am faintfrom sheer surprise.
Go to the feast in honor great,
And you shall dine in regal state.
The queen will doubtless grant your wish
And rarest daintiest grace your dish.
But as for me, I fear 'tis woe.
Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!"

The poor old bird actually wept in his fear and misery, not because he was sorry, but because he had been found out and afraid that his evil power was fast passing away.

Mr. Bigun hastened to the feast.

It was a joyful meeting. Old friends of his boyhood came to greet him and to tell of the wonderful courage of his sons, the great beauty and queenly grace of his wife and the wonderful valor and lovliness of Midget and the queen.

King Ugliz, however, was a great friend of the dragon, and determined to avenge the death of his old partner in wickedness, so he gathered a great army and came marching around by way of Lazy Man's mountain, intending to conquer the giants.

The fool bird told King Ugliz all he could find out about the giants, and in every way tried to help their enemies.

Ruel and Jethro led the giants to battle, and after the defeat of Ugliz and his army they were given his kingdom to rule as a reward for their courage.

The fool bird found his life a burden. No one now paid much attention to his evil counsel, so in despair he flew to the serpent island and arranged with the serpents to bring an old and ugly crocodile to ferry them across the lake to their former home in the swamp.

When the serpents were half way across the water, however, the old crocodile, who had brought all of his family with him, remembered that he was hungry, so he hit the raft on which the serpents were with his tail and broke it to pieces.

The whole crocodile family then ate the serpents until not one was left.

In a few minutes all the crocodiles were floating on the water, poisoned to death by the flesh of the serpents.

The fool bird who saw the whole affair cackled thus to himself, "I have this day made a great discovery. Crocodiles are poor company for the innocent, and the flesh of dragon serpents is not healthful. Thus by my wisdom has the cause of science been advanced."

During the following year the kingdom prospered as never before. The fool bird, who heretofore had great influence, was in disgrace, and people in general tried to cultivate their own virtues instead of finding faults in their neighbors.

Shortly after the destruction of the serpents a proclamation was issued that two royal weddings would be celebrated on the anniversary of the death of the dragon, and all the people were invited.

As the wedding march began, in walked Midget and Ruel, followed by the queen and Jethro. The secret had been well kept, and all the people were surprised to find that their own queen and Midget, who was now even more beloved, were to wed the daring and handsome young princes, Ruel and Jethro.

At the end of the wedding ceremony, but before the magistrate had turned away, there was still a greater surprise for the assembly. As a mark of special gratitude, all the mice had been invited to the wedding, and now before the astonished magistrate there stood the mouse king with a lady mouse upon his arm. She blushed as violently as a lady mouse could, and at the request of the mouse king they were married then and there. Immediately afterward, the magistrate was presented with the cane previously carried by the mouse king and told to strike three times upon the floor. When the third blow sounded not a mouse was to be seen, but instead a group of beautiful fairies, with their newly-married king and queen in their midst.

Such congratulations as were showered upon all the brides and bridegrooms are, even in the society of flatterers, seldom heard, and better than that, they were all sincere.

Before the reception was concluded the mouse fairy was asked to leave some good advice before he returned to fairyland, and his answer consisted of just four words, "Kill the fool bird."

With these words he presented Midget with a gold bow and silver arrow tipped with a diamond, and Midget, needing no further directions, shot the bird through the spot where his heart ought to have been. As he fell to the ground they all saw that he was only a bunch of feathers stuffed with vanity, with envy for eyes, folly for ears, and venom for a tongue. This was a great discovery, and it was decided that his body should be sent to the serpent island, where it would be in appropriate company.

The poor old bird actually wept.

"Now," said the mouse, "you have killed the last ally of the dragon, and peace, plenty and contentment will come to the kingdom. Good-night!"

Not a fairy was to be seen after this farewell, but our friends lived in the utmost peace, good will and happiness from that time forward.

THE END.

THE JOY OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

She was a tiny little girl, with sun-tanned hair, a blue calico dress and bare feet. She carried in her arms a baby half as large as herself, and the baby was so heavy that it sagged in the middle, giving the infant the appearance of being held by the feet and nap of the neck.

There was some excitement around the corner of the next block, and the children were hurrying forward like mad from all directions. The little girl tried to run, but the baby was too heavy, and her breath gave out. Said I, in a spirit of badinage:

"Drop the baby, sis, and go see what the trouble is."

She stopped and stared at me.

"I say put the baby down on the sidewalk and run."

"Yer must take me for a fool, mister."

"Why?"

"'Cos this is our baby."

"Well, suppose it is? I'll stay here and watch for you."

"No, yer won't, mister. Yer might carry it off."

"What if I did? Aren't you tired carrying it around and making your back ache?"

"Naw, I ain't. Say, mister, this is the only little baby we've got, and if yer only knowed how she can crow and laugh, yer wouldn't want me to do such a thing. This baby hain't got no ma, 'cept me, and pa and me couldn't do 'thout her. She sits up in a high-chair at the table and crows and kicks while me and pa eats, and at night I rock her to sleep as ma used to do. When ma died the baby didn't know no better, but just laughed and hollered, and I cried so I couldn't keep her still. Put her down on the sidewalk! Fool-killer'll get you, mister, ef yer stay around here long."

HE WAS HAPPY.—"She is mine," murmured Algernon Roseleaf Vincent. "She is mine." A balmy zephyr softly sighed outside; the sparkling lights shone brilliantly o'erhead—that was what they were there for. The whole world seemed saturated with pure joy. He drew her closer to him, and his eyes gazed lovingly on hers. "My queen." He did not speak aloud, but he was filled with such ecstatic bliss that the spheres in their courses seemed to sing "My queen." But Algernon—ah, sordid soul—loved her not for her looks alone. For though she was indeed a welcome sight, the thought that she would bring him wealth caused in him this rejoicing. She would capture the pot, containing $1.37 and two beer checks. He already had two queens and a pair of aces, and she filled his hand.

The serpent smiled affably. "Have an apple?" he insinuated. The mother of the race shrugged her shoulders. "Not this Eve," she rejoined; "s'm'other Eve." "This," mused the tempter, with a dazed look and a slight shiver, "must be the woman's version. Ah, yes."—Detroit Tribune.

Pay as You Go.

Pay as you go. 'Tis so easy to say
"I will settle to-morrow, or maybe next day;"
So easy to murmur, "Just charge this to me;
I will pay on the first, whatever it be;"
While the butcher and baker are writing it down
In a white little book with a cover of brown.

Pay as you go; if you haven't the cash,
Oh, try not to purchase with promises rash.
If you have not the money to buy what you need,
Don't open accounts, for 'tis sowing the seed
For a flourishing harvest of burdensome debt,
You must garner some day, while you worry and fret.

Pay as you go; be they ever so fair,
Your carpets and hangings, the clothes that you wear,
You cannot lie down in tranquil content,
When you're owing for furniture, clothing and rent,
While impudent hirelings of men that you owe
Harass you with bills, and more numerous grow.

Pay as you go; though your dwelling be small,
The furniture modest, and humble the hall,
If all the belongings are only your own,
'Tis better by far than a mansion of stone
With a turret and tower and pinnacle tall,
But a burden of debt o'erhanging it all.

MYSTERY OF A HOUSE.

When Pete kissed his wife good-bye in the morning his little frame house rested on rollers. The house mover's gang was hitching clanking chains to the heavy square timbers, and the brown horse with the dejected droop to his long head was ready to circle around the capstan and haul Pete's cottage into the street.

"Don't you worry a bit, Mary," said Pete, as he picked up his dinner pail. "The house mover told me that not an inch of plaster would fall. So long. I'll pick you up six blocks south to-night."

"Sure thing," replied the house mover to Pete's inquiry. "This is a dead easy job. You'll find your house in the middle of the street six blocks down there to-night, and your wife and children all O. K."

Pete was an iron moulder, and the foundry where he worked was a good hour's walk from home. He went to his bench in a cheerful mood. The elevated railroad company had paid him a good, stiff price for his lot, and had offered to move his home free of expense to him. Peter took the money and bought a lot cheap in a new street, half a mile nearer the foundry, two blocks from a school and with a church just around the corner. Taking it all in all, Pete considered he had made a good bargain.

During the day Pete's thoughts were on the little white cottage, with its clean muslin sash curtains and light green shutters, slowly traveling down the street. He could almost see Mary anxiously noting progress through the windows, and the children, wild with the novelty, racing and tearing around. Every moulder on the floor knew that Pete's house was on the move. They discussed the matter while grouped around the cupola waiting for the iron to run. They were full of suggestions, and Pete received the benefit of the concentrated advice of fifty sympathetic men. The foreman once had passed through the house moving experience, and, as he was the foreman, and as his house was a two-story brick, his advice was regarded as weighty and his suggestions treasured as words of great value.

After Pete had filled and emptied his ladle a dozen times and had washed up he started merrily to find his home. When he arrived at the corner where he expected to meet his cottage none appeared. Pete looked north and south through the dusk, but as far as he could see the street was clear. A policeman happened along.

"Say, officer," exclaimed Pete, "have you seen a one-story white frame cottage go by here to-day?"

The policeman stared at Pete for a second, then replied gruffly: "What'er you givin' me?"

"That's straight," said Pete, with energy. "They're moving my house. It ought to be here, but it ain't."

The policeman grew sympathetic at once. "I've seen no house movin', but there's some red lights over there two blocks. Mebbe it's your house."

Pete hurried for the red lights. It was a house perched on rollers in the middle of the street, but it was not his house. He clambered over timbers, chains and skids to the front door, for the steps had been amputated.

A woman with a hand-lamp answered the knock.

"Have you seen a one-story frame cottage, white, with green shutters, and a little woman with brown hair go by this way to-day?" asked Pete, hurriedly.

The woman shook her head.

"No," said she. "We're movin', too. My man hasn't got home yet, either. Mebbe he's hunting for me, too," and she giggled hysterically.

Pete gave her no comfort, but sprang to the ground. Near the house was a grocery, and there Pete inquired for his house. No one had seen it. "Pshaw!" said Pete. "It's a light house, and those house movers have got it on the lot."

He almost ran to the new site, and found it vacant. He had spent an hour searching for the white cottage and Mary. He had asked fifty persons if they had seen a white, one-story cottage on a tour, and now he seated himself on the edge of the sidewalk, in front of the new lot he had bought, and tried to pull himself together. He could not understand it. He could think of no other path over which the house might travel.

Suddenly a new idea struck him. "The fire department had made them pull the house into a vacant lot so as not to block the street. I'll start from the beginning, and if I don't find it to-night, I'll sleep in the woodshed. They haven't moved that, anyway. Only Mary will be worried."

In a quarter of an hour he was on the old familiar sidewalk. As he hurried along he closely examined every house on both sides of the street. Absorbed in this he forgot his whereabouts, and he choked and gulped in surprise when he suddenly looked into the windows of his own white cottage and saw Mary with her nose flattened against the glass watching for him. The house had not been moved a foot.

"Something broke," explained Mary, helping Pete to a heaping plateful of liver and bacon, "and the men will be back to-morrow."—Chicago Record.

SHEDDING INFORMATION.—"You said this morning in your paper," remarked the man who had climed four flights of stairs to see the editor, "that 'the condemned prisoner was a picture of distress.' How can a man be a picture of distress before he has been executed? That's what I want to know." "He would be one if he were about to be hung in an unpleasant frame of mind, wouldn't he?" retorted the editor. Without a word in response, the visitor turned and walked out, and a moment afterward the steady clump, clump, of his heavy feet on the stairs was heard, growing fainter and fainter as he made his way slowly down toward the open air.—Chicago Tribune.

PALMER NEWS.

PIERCE DISCHARGED.

Evidence Does Not Sustain Charge of Keeping Common Nuisance.

The case of the prosecuting committee of the town of Monson against Franklin L. Pierce of Palmer, for keeping a common nuisance at his barn over the line from Palmer in the town of Monson, was tried in the district court Monday, W. W. Leach appearing for the commonwealth and T. W. Kenefick for the defendant. The trial resulted in the discharge of Pierce.

J. H. Thompson and C. C. Keep testified to making a raid at the barn about 6 o'clock on the evening of June 14th, and to finding a pint bottle nearly full of whisky behind some old doors and windows on the upper floor. They also found a large number of bottles—about a hundred—in various places about the premises, some of them smelling of and containing liquor in small quantities.

H. R. Heath testified to the same. He also said that 10 or 15 minutes before the raid he saw, from a place of concealment, Pierce pour something from bottles into a milk can and take the can away; these bottles were among those which smelled of liquor. On the evening of June 13th he said he saw several men between Pierce's restaurant and harness shop on Commercial street in this village, and heard Pierce tell the others, "I'll put it in certain places, where they won't look for it." He was about 10 feet away, and could recognize Pierce by the light from a street lamp. Later in the evening he was there again, and heard a man say to Pierce, "You'd better look out for that," to which Pierce replied, "I'll take care of it to-morrow." They were standing beside a wagon in which were two packages resembling beer kegs, covered with a blanket; Pierce got into the wagon and drove to the barn. He had seen men and boys going to the barn and returning under the influence of liquor, seven at one time, nine at another and five at another, naming some whom he knew, and give May 31st, June 7th and 14th as the dates. On May 31st he saw Pierce at the barn about 3 in the afternoon; he stayed about three-quarters of an hour, during which time visitors came there; Pierce came to the barn again later in the day and had more callers, some of which Heath afterward saw returning intoxicated.

After the noon session Henry Dockery, whom Heath swore he saw came away from the barn intoxicated, was put upon the stand and testified that he had never been in Pierce's barn or upon his premises, and never came away under the influence of liquor.

Hiram Wade testified that as he sat upon his lawn on pleasant Sundays in a position from which he could see into the barn door when open, he saw persons go by the barn to what they call the "Glen," but he had never seen any one come from the barn intoxicated. His son, John Wade, testified that he went to the barn nearly every Sunday and stayed perhaps half an hour; he had never seen Heath about the place, nor Goodes and Kennedy, whom Heath testified he saw come away intoxicated.

F. L. Pierce, the defendant, was then put on the stand, and said that he brought two milk cans away from the barn every night full of milk. He testified that on May 31st he did not go the barn at any time, being sick at home; he had never seen Goodes nor Kennedy at the barn. On the evening of June 13th, the conversation which Heath claimed to have overheard between himself and others did not take place, and that on the same evening he did not drive to the barn with parcels resembling beer kegs in a wagon. He also testified that he had, at various times, different men under his employ; that he had seen bottles in the watering tub, but had sent them over from the restaurant to be washed; that he did not know that the bottle of whisky, which was found in the raid, was in the barn; he had not seen it before, and it did not belong to him; that he has had no one in his employ who with his consent or knowledge has kept liquor for sale; that his barn had not been used by him or anybody else, so far as he knew, as a place for storing liquor. He also testified that he had never given any one permission to enter his barn, but that it was always unlocked.

Edward Lynch then took the stand and testified that he did not know how the liquor exhibited in court came to be in the barn; that he had gathered up some bottles which were lying around last April and placed them in a can beside the lumber pile, where they were found. He had never seen any one intoxicated about the premises, and had never sold liquor there. When asked if he had ever seen the bottle exhibited in court, he replied that if he had it probably would not be in court.

H. S. Hobson testified that on May 31st, about the time that Heath said he saw Pierce at the barn, he was at the barn to see about getting the horse, and saw nothing whatever of Pierce.

The defense rested its case here. Lawyer Kenefick made a somewhat lengthy argument in behalf of Pierce, urging that as the evidence of the commonwealth in many respects had been proven false, and that no evidence had been submitted proving a sale, or that the liquor had been kept for sale, Pierce should be discharged. Lawyer Leach argued briefly that on the evidence submitted Pierce should be found guilty.

Decision was reserved until Wednesday, when Judge Robinson rendered his finding. He said that the evidence which the commonwealth submitted was the finding of a bottle of whisky and empty bottles, and the fact that men were seen going to the barn and coming away; that on May 31st Pierce was seen at the barn when two men went there who some time after were seen to return under the influence of liquor; and the conversation overheard between Pierce and others. The defense met this by disclaiming any knowledge or ownership of the bottle found, and accounted for the empty bottles by saying that a former employe left them there. The testimony of Mr Hobson and Pierce proved that Pierce was not at the barn on May 31st, and whoever Heath saw, it was not Pierce. The conversation might or might not refer to the hiding of liquor; therefore it was thrown out, and as no evidence had been submitted proving a sale, or that the liquor found was kept for sale, Pierce was discharged.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH.

And How Palmer Celebrated It—An Unusually Quiet Day.

Fourth of July passed off very quietly. The patriotism which generally manifests itself the night before was not so much in evidence as last year, the night being unusually quiet. The "boys" did all their celebrating on Main street. About 12 o'clock bells were rung and a large bonfire was built in front of LeGro & Lynde's drug store, and as it burned, lighting up the whole street, all were reminded that the 120th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence was at hand. The boys were orderly, no vandalism or rowdyism being indulged in, and the police who were on duty had no trouble whatever in preserving the peace. Residents near the McGilvray block on South Main street had been nearly panic stricken by a rumor that it was to be burned, and precautions were taken to prevent it. It is an old, unoccupied building, and would have burned like tinder, and on account of its close proximity to several other buildings a fire would have been dangerous. During the day considerable powder was burned, and the booming of cannon crackers betokened the loyalty of Palmer people. Forest Lake was well patronized, and a large crowd attended Barnum's circus in Springfield, over 500 tickets to that city being sold from this station in the morning. Many also witnessed the gun shoot between the Palmer and Monson teams, and the ball game on the park, full accounts of which are given elsewhere. Fireworks were set off by a few private individuals, and in the evening a private party of young people held a dance in the opera house. Music was furnished by the Palmer orchestra. Taken altogether, there was probably less demonstration than in any other recent year.

Palmer Sportsmen Win.

The members of the Palmer Rod and Gun Club who were defeated in a clay pigeon shoot a few weeks ago by their Monson brethren avenged themselves on the afternoon of the Fourth by turning the tables with a score of 96 to 82. Not only did the Palmer men make the largest score, but they captured the highest individual score and the three highest scores, and consequently are feeling happier than before. The result in detail:

After the shoot between Palmer and Monson three sweepstakes were arranged. In the first event W. E. Manchester took first money, breaking 4 out of 5; W. J. Dewey was second with 3, W. M. Peck third with 2, and Fred Gunn fourth with 1. There were 16 tied for third money, and to win W. M. Peck had to break nine in succession. In the second sweepstake Fred Caryl took first money with a clean score of 5, L. J. Fisherdick second with 4, and E. L. Wales third with 3. To break the tie for third money Wales had to break 13 in succession, which is exceptionally good shooting. In the last sweepstake L. Fisherdick took first money with 5 straight, A. King second with 4 out of 5, Fred Gunn third with 3, and W. M. Peck fourth with 1.

The shooting on the whole was very good, some fine scores being made. In the near future a team from the Palmer club will meet teams from the Monson and Ware clubs.

Clerks Do up the High Schools.

Although threatening clouds kept many away, a large crowd witnessed the ball game on the park Saturday afternoon between the clerks and a nine from the high school. Like Caesar of old, the clerks came, saw and conquered, but the vanquished died hard. As was predicted, it was a red-hot game and a pitcher's battle from start to finish. The team work on both sides was far superior to anything previously seen on the grounds. Both pitchers were in fine form and effective with men on bases, and being backed up by clean and sharp fielding, were able to keep the hits well scattered. For the first two innings neither side scored. In the third both scored one and in the fourth the clerks got another, making the score 2 to 1 in favor of the clerks. For the next two innings both sides rolled up goose-eggs; then in the seventh a timely two-bagger to the left-field bleachers scored another for the high schools. Converse was weakening a little, and in the next inning two more runs were made. The first of the ninth was the high schools' "Waterloo". A hit or two, with a few bases on balls, coupled with a few bad errors of judgment by the center-fielder were responsible for five runs and the game. The game was wholly free from kicking and disputes over the decisions of the umpire. The work of both batteries and the fielding of both infields were the features. The work of Umpire Mellen was very satisfactory. The score:

Innings,	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Clerks,	0	0	1	1	0	0	0	0	0	5—7
High Schools,	0	0	1	0	0	0	1	2	0	4—8

Batteries—Converse and Wells, Dillon and Shaw. Two-base hit, Shaw, Powers, Hobson; three-base hit, Murphy. Struck out, by Dillon, 15; by Converse, 11. Umpire, Mellen.

Honors for a Palmer Boy.

Rufus W. Stimson, who last year received the degree Bachelor of Arts at Harvard, was this year given the degree Master of Arts by the same institution, on the strength of work done during the year. During Mr. Stimson's residence at Harvard he has taken extra courses in divinity, until he has twenty-four hours of distinctively divinity work to his credit, only thirty being required for the degree Bachelor of Divinity. A special certificate over the signatures of the secretary and dean of the Harvard divinity school admits him to the incoming senior class of the Yale divinity school in September, where he will be next year. At Harvard Mr. Stimson has been a "Hopkins scholar," receiving $325 income from the Hopkins fund, which is awarded according to the rank of the student's record and current standing, it being upon a strictly competitive basis. Mr. Stimson is preaching at Southwick Sundays during the summer, and is at his home in Palmer Center during the week.

Bicycle Stolen.

Charles L. Johnson had his bicycle stolen Tuesday evening. He left it in the back shed at the home of C. D. Foster on the Thorndike road. The same night a young man giving his name as George Brown came to the farm to go to work, and during the night, it appears, he got up, took the wheel and departed, for in the morning the shed door was open, the wheel was gone, and the young man was also missing. The case has been placed in the hands of Deputy Sheriff Studley.

An epidemic of the mumps seems to be prevailing in this village at present, and is no respector of persons so far as those who have never been afflicted are concerned.

The Universalist Sunday school picnicked at Forest Lake yesterday. Dancing was in order in the pavilion. A goodly number attended, and the affair in every way was a success.

The barber-shop of Oliver LaSalle has been partitioned into two rooms. One will be occupied by LaSalle's barber shop and in the other a lunch room will be opened by John Shea, who will discontinue his night lunch cart.

The arc street light which has been located on the South side of Pine street at the head of Knox street, has been made to swing over the center of Pine street, thus lighting that street both ways as well as Knox street.

On Wednesday Ernest Hale, 12, of Monson, was charged with setting fire to a woodshed attached to a schoolhouse in that town not long ago. The reason he gives for setting fire was that he did not want to go to school. He pleaded guilty and his case was continued until Aug. 8th.

The Western Massachusetts Universalist Ministerial Association will meet next Monday at 10 a. m. in the Universalist church. A paper will be given by Rev. T. C. On Monday Wosketon Lubelczyk of Ware and Stanislaus Czheck of Thorndike were before the criminal court charged with maiming a dog on the Fourth in Thorndike. Their case was continued until Wednesday, when Czheck was fined $15, but as Lubelczyk proved to the satisfaction of the court that he had fired only blank cartridges, he was discharged.

Scribner & Smith's circus, which exhibited in Palmer in May of last year and gave good performances, will visit the place again on Monday, the 20th of this month. Special mention is made of the menagerie, the ethnological congress of strange and savage tribes, the trained animal exhibition and the circus performance proper, in which there are 30 acts. The admission is only 25 cents.

If drivers of horses have noticed material improvement in the surface of Main street between Central and Knox this week, they should give credit therefor to a prominent business man who has been learning to ride the wheel. He has covered considerable ground between the points mentioned, and has reduced the road surface to a degree of smoothness and hardness which has led Road Commissioner Brainerd to endeavor to make a contract with the business man for other sections of highway, but it is understood the latter's price is considered rather too high for economical road making.

The Sunday school of the Congregational church held its annual picnic at Evergreen Park, State Line, Tuesday. A large number attended, although many stayed at home on account of the weather. A few sports were held to make things interesting, among them a boat race and ball game. The boat race was won by Wing and Brainerd, each receiving a fish pole as a prize. The ball game was interesting. The team captained by W. E. Tuthill defeated the one captained by Louis Cross, 21 to 19. The feature of the game was the all around playing of D. F. Holden. All who attended had an enjoyable time.

The canvassers of the cemetery association are making their rounds for subscriptions to help on the work which the association is doing in the local cemetery, and are meeting with encouraging results. Persons who note the work done by the association must admit that a dollar in their hands is made to do double the amount of work it would if expended separately. And when it is remembered that the members of the association labor for nothing, the dollar subscriptions which are asked should not be long in coming. A large amount of work has been done during the past few months in grading lots, removing unsightly and decaying stumps, and trimming up in general. The cemetery has never looked so well as now, and the association should not be cramped in its work for the lack of a few dollars.

Much complaint is heard in town from the patrons of the New England Telephone Co. about the poor service rendered by the Ware office. The distance is not very long, but it takes a long time to get a message from that town. Something is evidently lacking.

Annie, the 16-years-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jeremiah Foley of Amherst, formerly of this place, died at the former place on Sunday. The body was brought here for burial, the funeral being attended by a large number of townspeople and many from Amherst.

The parade here on the morning of the Fourth by the "Circle Canadiene" was witnessed by a large number of people of the town. The society made a fine appearance, and called at the residence of Agent C. H. Hobbs to pay him their respects; in return they were given refreshments by Mr. Hobbs. The Columbian Band did escort duty, and their playing is worthy of special mention.

The Fourth was celebrated here in the usual manner. The racket began early Friday evening and continued until Saturday morning. The bells were rung at midnight, and a large bonfire was kept burning nearly all night. The day was an unusually quite one, as many of the people attended the several picnics and the circus in Springfield. The only accident reported happened to a boy by the name of Ober, who was burned about the face in attempting to pick up a cannon cracker.

Trouble for a Woman.

Evidently certain parties in Thorndike have never heard the expression "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," or else they do not know who their neighbors are. In the vicinity of Church street there lives a woman who thinks she is being persecuted by those about her. On Monday her little boy, while in a neighbor's woodshed, had the end of his finger badly cut with a saw in the hands of another child, and the doctor had to be called to dress the finger. Sometime during that night clothes which she had left on the line were cut and slashed, and from the fact that other clothes were out all around in that vicinity and were unmolested, proves, she thinks, that she alone is the object of enmity, her belief being further strengthened by the fact that on Tuesday night she hung her clothes on a friendly neighbor's line, but in the morning these clothes were also cut. The woman cannot account for these unfriendly acts, as she has always treated her neighbors well and cannot recall having done anything to incur their hostility. Persons of influence in the village are interested in the case, and are on the watch for the perpetrators of the deeds.

Sudden Death of Melville Smith.

Melville Smith, 62, one of Monson's life-long residents, died very suddenly at his home last Friday evening. He had just returned from attendance upon a funeral, and had gone to the barn to put up his team. As he did not return promptly his wife went out to look for him and found him dead. He had only partially finished unharnessing the horse.

Mr. Smith was born in Monson and had spent his whole life, with the exception of a short time in Worcester, in his native place. He was a prosperous farmer, and in addition to carrying on the farm he had, in company with his brother Reuben, run a saw mill for a number of years. His wife, two brothers, Reuben of Monson and Charles of Stafford, and two sisters, Eliza of Monson and Julia of Springfield, survive him. The funeral was held from his late home Monday; the burial was in the Center cemetery.

Miss Nellie F. Squier, librarian at the public library, is attending the summer school for librarians at Amherst. Miss Esther Keep is in charge of the library.

Heimann & Lichten have begun excavating preparatory to erecting a 90-foot smoke stack and new boiler house. They will put in two new 100-horse power boilers.

Now that the work of widening the road and grading is well under way at the center cemetery, people can get a good idea of the great improvement which is contemplated.

Thomas Hennessy, dresser tender for R. M. & T. Reynolds, who was recently injured by falling on the twister while at work, is recovering rapidly and will soon be out again.

The regular merchants' gala day will take place as usual under the auspices of the Monson Cornet Band. The date has been fixed for Aug. 11, and the fare will be $1 for the round trip.

Rev. A. L. Squier of Amherst will occupy the pulpit of the Methodist church next Sunday; preaching both morning and evening. In the evening the subject of the sermon will be "The Red Dragon."

A. A. Babbitt's new house is ready for the plasterers. The house will be ready for occupancy about September 1, when L. I. Williams & Co. will move their millinery store from the bank block to the house now occupied by Mr. Babbitt.

Work has been begun on the concrete sidewalks, B. F. Dotney of Chicopee having the contract. It is planned to run the walk north on Main street from W. N. Flynt & Sons' store to the McIntosh brook, and to connect the strip between the store of G. E. Grout and F. E. Howe's residence. This will make a line of concrete running from R. M. Reynolds's straw shop up North Main street, with only one small break.

An episode which might have ended seriously was brought to a happy ending one night this week by the sudden turning on of an electric light. A lady who has been visiting friends in town started for a walk in her sleep at 2 o'clock a. m., and was at work trying to gain entrance to an adjoining room by tampering with the lock. The man of the house heard her and thought burglars were at work. He armed himself with a revolver, but before shooting asked what was wanted and who was there; receiving no reply, he suddenly turned on the electric light and was greatly surprised to find that the supposed burglar was his guest. It is always best to be on the safe side before shooting.

The trustees and congregation of the Methodist church held a meeting Monday evening to discuss the proposed repairs at the church. It is proposed to put in new seats, cushions and carpets, stained glass windows, and refresco the ceiling and walls. The meeting appointed two committees to look up the matter of expense and to report at the adjourned meeting in two weeks. The committee on windows and frescoing is Frank M. King, E. J. Osborn, W. H. Underwood; the committee on seats, curtains and carpets is G. L. Keeney, H. E. Bugbee, A. W. Ferry. The grading and fencing of the church grounds is completed, much to their improvement. Subscriptions are being received for the proposed repairs, which are badly needed.

A Reply.

Editor of the Palmer Journal: DEAR SIR:—Will you give me an opportunity through the columns of the JOURNAL for correcting what I believe to be an erroneous impression, arising from the communication in your last issue concerning "The origin of Children's Day," by Rev. William H. Marble, pastor of the M. E. church of Monson. The discussion relates to the origin of Children's Day. The writer claimed that it originated with the Methodist church because that was the first "general ecclesiastical organization" which in an "official" way observed the day. You will perceive that the above claim is based upon the supposition that such "official" recognition by a "general ecclesiastical organization" is necessary in originating such an observance. Is such the fact? We read that the institution of the Sunday school was originated in 1781 through the individual efforts of Robert Raikes; but we find no mention of "official action" on the part of any "general ecclesiastical organization" at that time. Still later we read of another great movement, the Christian Endeavor Society, which was begun in the Williston Congregational church of Portland by Rev. F. E. Clark in 1881. At that time had any "general ecclesiastical organization" commissioned "Father Clark" to launch such a movement? And if such important and world-wide movements as the Sunday school and the Christian Endeavor movement could be originated without such "official" sanction, why not the observance of Children's Day?

The claim of the Universalist church is based on the fact that the observance of Children's Day began with Rev. Dr. Leonard in the Universalist church at Chelsea in June of 1856, and has been observed in Universalist churches every year since. The observance at that time was not one which might "naturally arise in the spring of the year" in connection with the Sunday school, but was the direct outgrowth of the ceremony of "The Dedication of Children," which has been observed in the Universalist church since 1780. It was distinctively a church service, and had a definite and fixed purpose in view. The observance in Universalist churches to-day is but the continuation of that service originated by Dr. Leonard in 1856. You will see that the claim is not based upon the "sporadic" observance of the day by an "individual minister," or an "individual church," but upon the continuous observance of the day by an ever-increasing number of Universalist churches.

You were further told in the communication referred to above, in proof of the position therein maintained, that it was not till 1867 that the General Convention of the Universalist church "recommended" the observance of the second Sunday in June as a day for the "baptism of children." Let me give the exact words of the convention at that time. The action was in the nature of a resolution commending "the practice of those churches in our order that set apart one Sunday in each year as Children's Day." You will perceive that the convention had no intention or thought even of establishing something new: they simply commended that which they recognized as already existent in Universalist churches. You will see that the day was called "Children's Day." In fact it has been so called since the date of its inception in 1856. In the Universalist observance of the day the central idea is not merely the "baptism of children," important as that may be; it is the dedication of children to the church, that through its holy ministrations and benign influences they may grow up to be an honor to the parents that gave them birth and the glory of Him who called them into being as the crowning act of His creation.

Beginning as they did in 1856, and continuing as they have with such a purpose in mind, cannot Universalists be said to have originated and to observe "Children's Day proper" as truly as though they had taken up a collection for some special purpose under the sanction and direction of some "general ecclesiastical organization" acting in an "official" capacity?

You will observe that our good brother has failed to distinguish the difference between the origin of an institution or observance, and the official recognition of the same. As a nation we date our political independence from July 4th, 1776, but we did not receive "official recognition" until some time later. That the manner of the observance of Children's Day in the Methodist church is peculiarly their own no one questions; that they originated that special method no one doubts. But in view of all the facts as stated above, can anyone truly say that Children's Day itself is, in its origin, "distinctly a Methodist institution?" We are glad to know that the Methodist church has recognized Children's Day in an "official capacity," but we still maintain that the recorded facts of history point to the Universalist church for its "origin."

The examiners found a good supply of gold among the funds, showing the bank is on a gold basis and in full sympathy with the Republican platform. Isaiah Hiscock, G. S. Rogers, W. S. Webber and Treasurer H. A. McFarland comprise of the board of investment.

The Fourth passed off very quietly, as the boys went to Barnum's circus in Springfield, many of them on their wheels, so they slept for the journey instead of celebrating all night as usual the night before the Fourth. Saturday evening there were several who had fireworks on a small scale. Not an intoxicated person was seen on the street.

A Pretty Church Wedding.

The Memorial church was the scene of a very pleasant wedding Tuesday, when Minnie, the daughter of Rev. Fayette Nichols, was united in marriage to Barlow Norris of Wallace, Nova Scotia. The bride was given away by her uncle, Rev. Mr. Nichols of Warren, and the ceremony was performed by her father, assisted by Rev. W. R. Newhall, the Episcopal service with ring being used. The church was prettily decorated with flowers and evergreens. The bride wore a gown of white silk, with veil and train, and carried a bouquet of bride roses and lilies of the valley. Miss Bessie Nichols, sister of the bride, was maid of honor; she was tastefully attired in a yellow and white costume, and carried a bouquet of yellow roses. The bridesmaids, Misses Page and Stevenson, wore gowns of white and carried bouquets of pink roses. A reception was held at the Methodist parsonage immediately after the ceremony; Barr of Springfield was caterer.

A very large audience was it attendance at the Congregational church last Sunday morning. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker sang several selections.

The fire pump at the Knowles pump works was tested Tuesday afternoon before the insurance agents, and three powerful streams were thrown at one time.

Rev. O. I. Darling and wife of Adams are stopping at Hotel Ramsdell. Mr. Darling expects to build his house on the hill back of Richardson street this summer.

The Father Matthews defeated the Bondsvilles in a very good game last Saturday by a score of 12 to 8. One of the features of the game was the playing of Shumway, both at the bat and in the field.

Stephen Cummings was arrested last evening for drunkenness and creating a disturbance. He was taken before Trial Justice Bush of West Brookfield this forenoon and sentenced to one year in the reformatory. He has been out of jail but a few months.

Workmen are employed in tearing down the foundation for a Catholic church on the corner of West Main street and Moore avenue. The bricks are being cleaned and piled up ready for use at some future time, when the new church is built on the corner of West Main and School streets.

The fire department made a very successful trial of the apparatus on Southbridge street Wednesday evening; 1150 feet of hose was laid to the steamer and then as much more was laid from the steamer extending to Washington street, and good pressure was obtained even then. This is the second trial, the first being made on Maple street, and they have both proved very satisfactory.

There was not much excitement the night before the Fourth. About the only damage done was at the new house of James Barry on School street, which is being built by the Utley Co. of Ware. The miscreants here pushed a section of brick walk out of line and mixed up a number of pounds of nails. The procession of Trades and Horribles was not a success in point of numbers, though what there was in line was very good.

The electric road has nearly reached the bridge, and may be running by Sunday. The majority of the men will leave now and go to Fiskdale to complete the line toward Southbridge. It is understood, however, that a few will remain and finish the grading from West Brookfield this way. Three large maple trees on East Main street have been cut down, as they were too far out in the street and would obstruct the road.

Miss Ellie Fairbanks, daughter of Edward Fairbanks, is dangerously ill from an attack of septic-peritonitis, and is not expected to live but a short time. She was taken ill Sunday evening and an operation was performed Tuesday evening by Dr. F. W. Chapin of Springfield, assisted by Dr. W. H. Pomeroy of Springfield and Dr. C. A. Deland of Warren. The relief gained by the operation was only temporary, though it relieved her of much suffering. The whole town is saddened, and expressions of sympathy are heard on every side.

Marvelous Results.

From a letter written by Rev. J. Gunderman of Dimondale, Mich., we are permitted to make this extract: "I have no hesitation in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery, as the results were almost marvelous in the case of my wife. While I was pastor of the Baptist church at the Rives Junction she was brought down with pneumonia succeeding la grippe. Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little interruption, and it seemed as if she could not survive them. A friend recommended Dr. King's New Discovery; it was quick in its work and highly satisfactory in results." Trial bottles free of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware. Regular size 50c and $1.

Mrs. Rhodie Noah, of this place, was taken in the night with cramping pains and the next day diarrhoea set in. She took half a bottle of blackberry cordial but got no relief. She then sent to me to see if I had anything that would help her. I sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and the first dose relieved her. Another of our neighbors had been sick for about a week and had tried different remedies for diarrhoea but kept getting worse. I sent him this same remedy. Only four doses of it were required to cure him. He says he owes his recovery to this wonderful remedy.—Mrs. Mary Sibley, Sidney, Mich. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Last summer one of our grandchildren was sick with a severe bowel trouble. Our doctor's remedies had failed, then we tried Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Dirrahoea Remedy, which gave very speedy relief. We regard it as the best medicine ever put on the market for bowel complaints.—Mrs. E. G. Gregory, Frederickstown, Mo. This certainly is the best medicine ever put on the market for dysentery, summer complaint, colic and cholera infantum in children. It never fails to give prompt relief when used in reasonable time and the plain printed directions are followed. Many mothers have expressed their sincere gratitude for the cures it has effected. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

One Lost Day

is not much out of a lifetime, but to a business man it may mean the loss of a valuable opportunity. When temporarily crippled with any pain or weakness, for which an active and effective external remedy is needed, nothing is so trustworthy as Johnson's Belladonna Plaster. It touches the spot and gives the welcome relief. It is made to succeed—not merely to sell. Look for the Red Cross on all the genuine.

THE POOR OLD MAN.

Emma, a girl of ten, was brushing the hearth, which the ashes from the grate, in which a blazing fire was now burning, had somewhat disordered; while Mary, who was two years younger, was reading. Charley, a little rogue of five who had a smiling face which could not help looking roguish, was stroking the cat the wrong way, much to the disturbance of poor tabby, who had quietly settled herself down to pleasant dreams on the hearthrug.

All at once a loud knock was heard at the door.

"Emma," said the mother, "you may go to the door and see who it is, and invite the person in, for it is a cold day."

Emma immediately obeyed the mother's direction.

"Is Mrs. Lowe at home?" inquired Henry Beaumont, for it was he.

"Yes, sir," said Emma; "please walk in and you may see her."

She ushered the old man into the comfortable sitting room, where Mrs. Lowe arose to receive him.

"I believe," he said, "I'm not mistaken in thinking that your name before marriage was Anna Raymond?"

"You are right, sir; that was my name."

"And have you no recollection of an uncle that wandered away from home and friends, and from whom no tidings have come for many a long year?"

"Yes, sir; I remember him well—my uncle Henry—and I have many times wished I could hear something from him. Can you give me any information?"

"I can—for I am he."

"You, my uncle?" said Mrs. Lowe, in surprise; "then indeed you are welcome. Emma bring your uncle the armchair, and place it close to the fire; and Mary, bring your father's slippers, for I am sure your dear uncle must long to get off those heavy boots. And now, uncle, when you are quite rested, I must demand a recital of all your adventures."

"But your brother, Alexander?" interrupted Mr. Beaumont; "let me first inquire about him. He lives in town now, does he not?"

A light cloud came over Mrs. Lowe's face.

"Yes," she said, "he does live in town; yet, strange as it may appear, I seldom or never see him. He has succeeded well, and is wealthy. But ever since he married a wife with a small property and greater pride, he has kept aloof from us. I do not blame him so much as his wife, who is said to have a great influence over him. I have called once, but she treated me so coldly that I have not felt a disposition to renew my visit."

"I can easily believe it; for I, too, have been repulsed."

"You repulsed? Did your give you name, and inform her of your relation to her husband?"

"I did; but she did not invite me to enter, and she was evidently impatient for me to be gone. I took the hint, and here I am."

"At least, uncle," said Mrs. Lowe smiling, "you need not be afraid of any repulse here."

"Of that I am quite sure," said the old man, looking affectionately into the face of his niece. "But you have not told me of your husband. Let me know if you have made a good match," he added playfully.

"That depends on what is meant by the term. If it implies a rich husband then I failed most certainly, for William's salary is only $1000, and that is what we have to depend upon. But for all that I care not, for a kind, affectionate husband is worth far more than a magnificent house and the most costly furniture."

"You are right," said her uncle. "There must be something which your limited means will not permit you to obtain, but which would be desirable, is there not?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Lowe; "I am anxious to give Emma and Mary a musical education, but William's means will not allow of such extravagance as the purchase of a piano, so that is one of the things we must be content to deny ourselves."

Mr. Lowe then entered, and being informed of the character of his visitor he extended him a hearty welcome. A comfortable repast was soon spread, of which Mr. Beaumont readily partook. His spirits rose, and he seemed to grow younger as he saw the cheerful faces around, and felt himself at home. Soon after the evening meal he rose to depart.

"Surely you are not going," said his niece; "you must henceforth take up your abode with us."

"We will see about that, and if you don't think you will get tired of me perhaps I will come. But I have hired a lodging and must undoubtedly remain in it for a few days."

"But you will call in every day and make yourself perfectly at home, even before you come here to stay," persisted his niece.

"Be sure of that."

In accordance with his promise, Mr. Beaumont made his appearance next day at 11 o'clock, and was received as cordially as before. He had hardly been in the house a few minutes when a rap was heard at the door. Mrs. Lowe beheld two men who had just driven up in a wagon.

"Where is the piano to be put, ma'am?" they inquired.

"It's all right," said a loud voice behind her.

She turned round in amazement.

"You know," continued the uncle, "that I have come to live with you, and I thought I would pay my board in advance, that is all. As you expressed a wish yesterday for a piano I thought it would be as acceptable a way as any."

"You, uncle? Why, excuse me, but I thought from—from—"

"You mean," said he smiling, "that you thought from my appearance that I could not afford it. And I confess" said he, casting a glance at himself in the glass, "that my dress is not in the extreme of fashion; and in fact, I was obliged to look some time when I called at the second-hand clothing shop the other day, before I could find these. However, as I have got all the service I wished out of them, I shall throw them aside to-morrow and appear more respectably clad."

"What! are you wealthy, uncle?"

"Depend upon it, Anna; I didn't spend ten years in the East Indies for nothing, was the reply. "I had the mind, however, to put on the appearance of a poor man, and so test the affection and disinterestness of my relations. One of them, however, I found not at home. I am happy to find myself at home with the other."

Let us turn to the aristocratic Mrs. Beaumont, who, a few days succeeding the events here recorded, was in her drawing-room receiving calls.

"By the way," said a fashionable visitor, "I am to have your relatives, the Lowes, for my next door neighbors."

"Next door neighbors!" exclaimed Mrs. Beaumont, in amazement. "What do you mean?"

"Is it possible that you have not heard of their good fortune? Mrs. Lowe's uncle has just returned from the East Indies with an immense fortune. He has taken a house in the same street with ours, and when they have moved into it he will take up his residence with them. Meanwhile, he is stopping at the Clarendon hotel."

"What! Henry Beaumont?"

"The very same. But I thought you knew it."

When the visitor withdrew Mrs. Beaumont ordered her carriage and immediately drove to the hotel where her husband's uncle was stopping. She sent up her card and requested an audience.

The servant soon returned with another card, on which were traced the significant words, "Not at home."—Door County Advocate.

A YANKEE'S IDEA OF THE ALPS.—An American was stopping in Rome, and one day he overheard some Europeans boasting about the beauty of the scenery of Europe. It grew so tiresome at last that he turned around and politely joined in the conversation, incidentally introducing some remarks about the grandeur of the Rocky Mountains, their height, etc. "But," said one of the Europeans, "surely, Mr. American, you must have crossed the Alps Mountains when you came to Rome! What did you think of them?" "Why, now you speak of them, I do remember passing over some rising ground, something that would probably require a tow-horse if a street-car line ran over it."—Harper's Round Table.

JACK'S BABY.

He hardly realized how many years had passed since he left that dear New England home. A home in the happiest sense of the word it had been to Jack Stuart, and his wife was so dear to his heart that when she died suddenly a few days after the birth of their first child, it seemed to him that life was not worth the living. He shut himself away from everyone in the room endeared to to him by her daily presence, avoiding, when possible, even his mother, and refusing to see at all the helpless mite of humanity who had been the innocent cause, by her birth, of his heavy affliction. Finally, he became so desperate from the continued importunities of his well-meaning friends that he left home to go, he cared not where, to escape them, and his fiercely rebellious feeling also, if possible.

Some time elapsed before they heard from him and learned that he was far away from them in the distant West. After that first letter was received they heard from him quite regularly, and he sent in each letter money to his mother, who cared tenderly for his child.

In time he came to know that "the baby," as she was still in his thoughts, could write a nice loving letter, for she sent several little notes to him enclosed in grandma's letters. There was a mist before his eyes, and a choking sensation in his throat as he looked at the first neat letter, a fond, girlish effusion, seeming to him so like in chirography and dainty expression to his lost Nellie's letters, and walking rapidly many times back and forth across the room he said to himself, "The baby must be quite a girl now."

He came to watch eagerly for these fond effusions to "Dear Papa," and the baby was winning her way fast and surely to a very tender affection in her father's lonely heart. He longed, often almost feverishly, for the sight of the girlish face, a touch of soft, caressing hands again. But there came a letter, when this feeling was holding the man's heart with intensity, telling him that his loved mother had passed away, and then another followed in a few days after the sad tidings, such a pathetic, heart-broken letter it was, from the baby, and the close of it told him that she was coming to him. He was all she had left to love and care for now, she said, and a place good enough for her dear father to live in was surely good enough for his daughter. She would leave for the West at once, she wrote. She did not mind the journey. She must come to him and she was sure he would be glad to see her.

Jack was still holding this letter, which had brought consternation to his bereaved heart, with a dazed look on his pale face and trembling with emotion, when Frank Browne entered the ranch. It was such a white face with wild-looking eyes that Jack raised to his gaze that Frank was startled, and exclaimed:

"What is it?"

"The baby is coming here," was Jack's reply.

At this answer Frank was even more startled than before, and regarded Jack wonderingly. Frank Browne was a new comer among the ranchmen. The reticent man had taken a decided fancy to the young man at first, and the regard was warmly returned by the homesick younger man. The kindred tie of refined individuality strengthened their friendship, as it held them aloof, to some degree, from the rougher element around them. Frank knew of Jack's late bereavement, and he wondered what else had come to him in his weakened state, as he glanced at the letter, for Jack was just recovering from a severe malarial attack, during which Frank had cared for him as tenderly as a woman might.

"Yes, Frank, the baby has written that she is coming here, coming at once. I wrote to her, telling her what she had better do and where she had better go, now that—well, she had no one to care for her now, you see, but she hadn't got my letter when she sent this one, and maybe she'll start before she does get it. She may reach here any time now, and I don't know what to do, my boy. We must try to fix up things here a little."

Frank shared the rough abode with him. He wondered as to the "baby," yet he entered into the spirit of the preparations for her coming with the zest of youth, and when one of the other ranchmen asked, seeing the unusual stir about the ranch, "What's up, youngster?" he could only answer, "The baby's coming," in Jack's words.

"The baby!" three voices repeated in chorus.

"So he said," Frank replied, getting red in the face and much confused as they stared at him. Then the speaker, "Old Cy Hobbs," as he was called, said to the others, "Gone clean crazy, I reckon, an' the youngster had better look sharp fur him—had summat on his mind, was cracked, when he came here. I allus told ye he warn't jest right in the upper story. A woman in the case; p'raps er young un too, but she must be er pooty big baby by this time, seein' he's been here a right good spell, 'lowing fur her growth." And laughing loudly at Cy's wit they turned away, leaving Frank to wonder still more.

They were ten miles from a small settlement and many more than that from the nearest railroad, and the rude stage was quite an event when it came that way. It was at the close of a lovely day in September that the rickety old vehicle came in sight and the ranchmen and herders gathered in listening attitudes watching its approach, peering curiously as it passed on and stopped at Jack Stuart's ranch. A sweet-faced, dainty little lady alighted, and glanced with wondering blue eyes at the rude scene.

Frank had gone to the spring for water when the stage arrived, and it was just turning away as he came around from the rear of the door. The water pail dropped from his hand at the wild cry of "Nellie! My Nellie!" Jack fell heavily from sheer weakness as he rose from his chair, and a girlish voice cried out piteously, 'Oh papa! papa! I've killed him!"

At the sound of that voice, looking up from the prostrate figure of the father he was raising, into the daughter's eyes, Frank Browne cried out joyously, yet with a wealth of tenderness in the manly tones: "Edie! My darling, my love!"

"And to think that you were away out here, Frank, and took such good care of papa in that dreadful sickness, and I"—and Edie's blue eyes dropped in confusion before the admiring fondness of the dark ones, as her voice ceased, faltering.

"And you are not sorry that you found me here, my darling! You do not, you will not believe the hateful things they told you. As if I could give a thought to her, as if I could be in the least other than true to you, my love. You will trust me, Edie!"

For answer, nestling closely to him, like a baby, Edie murmers, lowly, "Now and ever, my love."

"The baby," her father's and husband's doting pride, makes a fine housekeeper in the beautiful home overlooking picturesque Casco bay, and watching her in her wifely duties with just fatherly pride, it seems sometimes to Jack, still holding to the tender memory of that dear, olden home, as if she must be his loved Nellie, and he often calls her unthinkingly by that familiar name. She is so like her mother in all ways and looks, save for the bonnie blue eyes, ever brightening so at his coming. They are Jack's own, and Nellie's especial delight were those fearless and truthful blue eyes, with "heaven's ain light" in them.—Elsie Carroll Sargent.

GEN. LEE'S LAST CHARGE.

"Charging is the last resort of brave but baffled commanders," said a local critic of military affairs, "and it almost always results disastrously." Thirty-one years ago (March 24) the affairs of the confederate army of northern Virginia were desperate enough to warrant its brave commander, Gen. Robert E. Lee, to resort to charging. So it came to pass on the morning of the 25th day of March, 1865, he made a break through the Union lines and opened the way to City Point, which, if he could have reached and held, would have prolonged the civil war for at least another year.

The preliminaries were all arranged. First of all a hundred men appeared in front of our picket line, and announced themselves as North Carolina deserters. They were all armed, but the officer in charge of our pickets welcomed them and told them to bring in their guns, as Gen. Grant had recently issued an order commanding his quartermaster to pay for all guns brought in from the rebel ranks. So this hundred of armed men were graciously invited to march in behind our pickets. When once there they turned suddenly upon the astonished Union troops and requested them to surrender in words to impolite too print. And the pickets had no choice but to obey.

In the rear of the picket line stood Forts Haskell and Stedman, garrisoned by the 14th New York artillery, several of whom belonged in Utica. In the early dawn of that mild March morning the sleeping members of the 14th were awakened by the sharp "Yi! Yi!" of the rebel troops, who pounced in upon them 10,000 strong or more. They were under the command of Gen. William Mahone of Virginia. After capturing the 14th they were expected to move forward to City Point.

But here an obstacle arose that neither Mahone nor Gen. Lee had foreseen. That obstacle was our supplies of food. It was utterly impossible to get the confederates, who were actually starving, beyond our soft bread and coffee, our fresh beef and salt pork. The whole body paused and went to eating, drinking and making merry, without regard to the conclusion of that well-known saying, "For to-morrow we die." It was all in vain that Gen. Mahone threatened and swore and coaxed his men. They simply would not stir till they had satisfied their appetites.

This pause was the salvation of the Union army. It enabled not only the majority of the 14th to escape from their captors, but the other divisions of the 9th corps to come to their relief, so that when the rebels were ready to advance they found their way blocked, and they were compelled to retire from the scene of their victory and their breakfast table back to Petersburg badly beaten, and carrying with them nothing but full stomachs.

The foregoing is a brief but truthful account of Gen. Lee's last charge. In a little more than a week from that day he evacuated Richmond and Petersburg, and in less than another week he surrendered his entire army to Gen. U. S. Grant.—Utica Observer.

SPLITTING LEGAL HAIRS.

This is an after dinner story told by a well known lawyer the other evening, illustrative of legal difficulties that may arise even in the carrying out of the most amicable contracts:

There was once four brothers who had inherited a storage warehouse from their father, and who equally divided the property between them. Among the appurtenances thereto was a cat, a fine animal, excellent for mousing, and this, too, was divided, the elder brother owning the right front quarter, the second brother the left front quarter, and the younger brothers the two hind quarters. Now, unfortunately, the cat in one of its noctural prowls injured the right front paw and the elder brother attended to that portion of his property by binding the injured member with a greased rag. The cat, thankful for this relief to its suffering, went to sleep contentedly before the fire, but in the midst of its slumbers a falling coal ignited the rag and the animal, howling with agony, dashed through the warehouse, and, coming into contact with some combustibles, set the building on fire.

When the loss came to be figured out the three younger brothers wished to throw it all upon the elder, upon the ground that if had he not tied up his part of the cat with the inflammable rag the building would not have been destroyed. He, on the contrary, contended that had the cat only been possessed of the front right paw, his property, it would have stood still and burned to death. It was the three other paws that caused the damage. The brothers argued the case till they died, but could never reach an agreement.—Philadelphia Record.

THE WAR ON THE THEATER HAT.

The young man was bringing to bear all his limited attainments as a contortionist in his effort to see around the tall, wide hat worn by the sweet girl in front of him.

The young woman whom he was accompanying saw him and pitied him.

Then a knowing smile passed over her face, and she leaned over and whispered loudly enough for the girl with the big hat to hear:—

"What a lovely hat that girl in front of you has on."

He looked fierce, but said nothing, and the owner of the hat stared straight ahead with a pleased expression.

"What a pity it is," the young woman with the knowing look resumed, "that she doesn't know it isn't on straight."

The girl in front made a convulsive grab and shifted the hat to one side. Then it didn't feel right, and she shoved it away over on the other side, only to hear, a commiserating stage whisper, behind her:—

"Poor thing! She'll never get it straight now!"

It was too much. The girl in front reached up with a resolute hand, undid the hat and laid it in her lap, while the young man cast a glance at his companion which was eloquent with undying admiration and eternal gratitude.—Detroit Free Press.

WHAT THE CHINOOK REALLY SAID.

A good story was told lately of Commodore March of March's Point, Fidalgo Island, whose ready wit is well known to the habitues of the Hotel Butler, and, indeed, all over the Sound. The commodore was called as a witness in the Point Roberts dispute between the cannery men and the Indians, and the lawyer on the other side, with a "what-do-you-know-about-it air," put the question to him:—

"How long have you been in this part of the country, Mr. March?"

Mr. March has a pretty chin, and he shaves his white whiskers to either side to show it off. When the question was so suddenly put, he softly caressed the pretty chin and slowly and meditatively said, as to himself:—

"Forty, forty-five, fifty," and at length answered: "Fifty-five years."

"Fifty-five years!" said the lawyer, and then, as if he were addressing Christopher Columbus, asked:—

"And what did you discover, Mr. March?"

"A dark visaged savage."

"Dark-visaged savage, eh? Yes; and what did you say to him?"

"I said it was a fine day."

"Fine day? Yes, and what did he say to you?"

Mr. March rattled off a whole yarn in Chinook, and kept on, to the mirth of the whole court room, until peremptorily cut off by the gavel of the judge.

"I asked you what reply the savage made to you, Mr. March. Please answer the question," said the irate cross-examiner.

"I was answering."

"Tell us what the savage said."

"That was what he said."

"Then tell it to us in English."

"Not unless I am commissioned by the court to act as interpreter and paid the customary fee."

The lawyer thought a moment, looked at the judge, who could not resist a smile, and said severely, "Mr. March, you may stand down."—Post-Intelligencer.

THE SULTAN'S LAST CHESS GAME.

Sultan Murad was devoted to the game of chess. To say, without flattery, that he was a good player, is to say that he was a man of considerable intellectual power.

But Sultan Murad in his play had two failings; he liked to have an adequate stake on the event of the game, and he could very ill brook defeat. These weaknesses are always trying, but, in the case of so powerful and absolute a monarch, they rendered the game one of exceeding danger. To lose pretty constantly meant ruin; to win too often might easily mean death. Under these circumstances, it became difficult for his majesty to find an adversary, and an invitation to a contest came to have as fatal a significance, and to be as much dreaded and, if possible, avoided as the post of grand vizier had been in the reign of Selim the Grim. So many had lost all they possessed and some their lives into the bargain, that every high officer of the state shunned, as far as possible, the dangerous honor of facing his master across a chessboard. It so happened that the present grand vizier was as keen an enthusiast for the game as the sultan himself. This had been probably his chief recommendation for the office; and, being a born gambler and of a constitutionally bold and reckless nature, he was always ready to play, counting neither the cost nor the hazard. He played on the varying fortune, but generally losing, until he had staked and lost everything he possessed or could scrape together.

At length, one afternoon, on the sultan saying to him, "Well, Grand Vizier, and what dost thou venture on this new game?" he answered ruefully: "My Padishah, except the garments in which I stand before thee, and which are thine already, there is of a truth no one thing I possessed that I have not staked and lost, and only by the bounty of thy majesty shall I and Fatima, my daughter and only child, find bread or shelter, so great is the skill of your majesty at this infernal game."

"Come, Vizier," said Murad, "if it be so bad with thee as that, I will tell thee what thou shalt do. Thou on thy part stake thy daughter, and I on my part will stake the loveliest odalisque in my harem, and 10,000 gold pieces to boot, and we will play yet another game."

The grand vizier heard this proposal to stake his daughter, his only child, with dismay; but he knew his imperial master too well to venture a refusal. Therefore they played, and he lost. Then the unhappy father, in his bitterness of his heart, said; "Oh, sultan, I have my head only, and that is at thy mercy, but if thou wilt on thy part stake my daughter, who thou hast just won, I will wager my head against her." "Vizier," said Murad, gravely, "the stakes are hardly even, but if thou wishest it, so it shall be."

And once more they played, and again the vizier lost.

Then Murad laughed, and said: "Be not alarmed; I give thee thy last stake, for thou hast never flinched, but hast ever played boldly and well; only this understand, we have played our last game, and thou holdest thy office only until I appoint another in thy place."

After this final defeat of his courageous and indomitable grand vizier, Murad was hard put to find any suitable opponent to face him at the chess-board. All men shirked the dangerous honor, and the unhappy vizier, or pasha, commanded to undertake the duty, found it difficult to guess whether victory or defeat might prove more perilous.

At length the sultan bethought him of a plan which seemed to promise more diversion than could be obtained from encountering these timorous and unwilling adversaries. He caused it to be proclaimed that any man might challenge his majesty to a game of chess, the conditions being that the challenger stake his own head against the office of grand vizier.

To such lengths will the cupidity and self-confidence of many men carry them that numbers were found ready to face the sultan on these terms; but whether Murad's skill was invincible, or whether his opponents were frightened and unnerved by the risk they ran, at any rate each succeeding aspirant lost his head instead of attaining the object of his ambition—the coverted position of grand vizier.

At the time of issuing the proclamation there lived in Adrianople a family consisting of three persons—father, mother, and one son. The latter was a young man of pleasing manners, a good presence, and of remarkable energy and intellectual capacity. The news of the sultan's offer had reached this retired and secluded family, and the son, who had long been a devoted student of the game, had just announced to his father and mother his determination to proceed to the capital and put his life on the hazard of the event.

When Osman was ushered into the presence of the sultan, and the object of the coming explained, Murad himself felt some regret that so handsome and intelligent a youth should risk his life in a combat apparently so unequal. After regarding him in silence a few moments, he asked him, "Dost thou understand clearly what are the conditions of the game we are about to play?"

"If I have been correctly informed, sire," said Osman, "the conditions are these: If I win, your majesty will appoint me your grand vizier; if I lose, my life is the forfeit."

"And dost thou still wish to play on these terms?" asked Murad.

"I have," answered Osman, "traveled far to seek that honor."

"But what can that fatal honor avail thee," asked Murad, "or what benefit can accrue to thee if thou must die?"

"Hope sustains the soul," said Osman, "and makes us willing to risk life for an adequate reward."

"How long hast thou studied chess?" demanded the sultan.

"My father taught me as a boy," answered Osman, "and all my life I have loved and studied it."

"Very good," said Murad; "then at thy desire this day shalt thou play for thy life."

But first, by order of the sultan, a sumptuous repast was served, and at his invitation Osman partook of it with him. Then, after a period of rest during the midday heat, the chessman were brought out, and, amid a circle of high dignitaries and officials of the palace, the youthful stranger faced his imperial lord and essayed the difficult, and, as it appeared to all present, the foolhardy task of checkmating him.

Only five moves had been made, during breathless silence, when Osman calmly pronounced the word "checkmate," and on inspection the fact was clearly established. All were astonished. And the sultan, amazed and almost stupefied, was filled with fury.

"What," cried he, "beaten, and in five moves by a mere boy! What is the meaning of this? Say, what demon had helped thee, or by what power of enchantment hast thou been able to accomplish the feat?"

"Sire," replied Osman, "this opening of the game is a new one. Being completely unexpected, it has given me, for this time, the victory which I can never hope again to attain over so great and experienced a player as your majesty."

These words somewhat mollified the sultan, and, after having sat silent for a few minutes, his wrath being partly appeased, he said: "By whatever means the victory has been gained, incontestably it has been won, and since thou must have paid thy forfeit hadst thou lost, "Allah forbid that thou shouldst fail to receive the reward that I have promised."

He thereupon commanded that Osman should be arrayed in the gorgeous robes of the office, and, summoning all the officers and high dignitaries of the Seraglio to the hall of the throne, he presented Osman to them as grand vizier.

Then, as he dismissed him, he said, significantly: "Grand Vizier, to-morrow we will play again."

In the evening Osman sat in the official palace of the grand vizier, and the reis effendi, an old freind of his father, by his invitation, sat at meat with him, and they discussed what had passed and what was to be apprehended.

"Osman," said the reis effendi, "thou hast played a bold game and won it; yet I know too well the character and disposition of Murad to be able sincerely to congratulate thee. To-day thou art victorious and grand vizier, to-morrow thou mayst only too probably be defeated and slain."

"Reis Effendi," answered Osman, "each must yield to fate; but for my part, I have no intention of playing a game against the sultan to-morrow."

"Thou hast no intention!" cried the reis effendi, in amazement. "Nay, but he has the intention to command thee to do so, and art thou so simple as to suppose that thou hast power to refuse?"

"I am hardly so country-bred as to suppose that," said Osman; "nevertheless, I venture to hope that I may be able so to order things that Murad shall not demand a game again to-morrow."

"And how is that to be accomplished?" demanded the reis effendi. "What dark scheme is this thou hast in hand?"

"At present I have no scheme completed," said Osman, "but only the outline or idea of the tactics which must be restored to. My aim must be to set some affair of such urgency and importance before Murad tomorrow morning that, for the nonce, he will have neither the leisure nor the inclination for chess-playing or any other form of amusement. In the concerns of so great an empire—"

Before Osman could complete the sentence an attendant entered, and announced that an old man was waiting without who desired earnestly an interview with the grand vizier.

"It is late," said Osman, "but if he be an old man, doubtless he must have an adequate reason for coming at this hour. Let him enter.

When the applicant entered the apartment, what was Osman's astonishment to behold in him no other than his own father. After having been warmly welcomed by both Osman and the reis effendi, the old man was pressed to say how it came to pass that he had undertaken so long a journey.

"My son," he replied, "after thy departure, neither thy mother nor, sooth to say, myself either could control the anxiety and apprehension we suffered on thine account. Therefore, having sold a ring—the last remaining valuable in our possession—in order to provide the small fund necessary for my journey, I followed thee to learn the result of thy rash attempt. Happily, it appears that thou hast won and not lost the game, yet whether thou art not still in imminent peril is much to be doubted."

"That thy son is even now in extreme peril of his life there can be no question," said the reis effendi. "To-morrow he must again, play unless indeed he can manage to divert the sultan's attention and alter his declared intention. But in what way such a diversion is to be accompanied I cannot imagine."

"If that be the case," said the old man, "it is indeed well that I undertook the journey hither, for I have brought intelligence which may now stand us in good stead. On my way I learned by accident of a conspiracy that appears to be hatching in Rumelia, the early knowledge of which may prove of great value to the sultan and all of his advisers."

"Thou art indeed fortunate," said the reis effendi, "to be in possession of that information. His majesty will doubtless be alarmed, and his attention engrossed by the details of such a project."

When next morning Osman, in his capacity as grand vizier, was closeted with Murad, he hastened to impart to him the intelligence he had received concerning the projected rising and the design of the rebels to march upon the capital.

On hearing this account, Murad, seized with panic, talked of raising a large army and at once marching upon the disaffected province.

Osman, however, said calmly: "If your majesty will permit me to express my opinion, I should say let no man know of this conspiracy, for even the rumor of insurrection is apt to unsettle men's minds and spread the infection of revolt. The plan of the conspirator at present is secret; let it never be declared; crush it in the bud. At this stage a very small force will suffice,

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE WIDOW SCHMIDT'S COW.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER I.

There lived in the village of Hardluck, near a forest, in the kingdom of Verneland, the Widow Schmidt. Her husband had been a farmer, who, for his time and place, had been wealthy. He had at one time owned two cows, a horse and wagon, his house, barn and considerable land. Now, among our farmers this would not be considered to have made him very rich, but in that village he was counted as one of the wealthy people.

The village was called Hardluck because most of the people, instead of cultivating the land or doing their regular work, would waste much time in complaining of their hard luck.

They really had much misfortune, but their worst trouble was laziness and poor management.

Two neighbors might meet in the morning, and one would begin to tell his misfortunes. The other would listen for a long time, and then would feel very much grieved if he could not recite greater troubles. In this way, while on their way to work, half the day would be wasted. Each, in thinking of his own hard luck, would become discouraged, and what work he actually did was done in such a slovenly and half-hearted manner that it was of little real value.

Mr. Schmidt and his next door neighbor, Mr. Stine, had always been too busy to grumble much and hence were quite prosperous. They took more interest in hard work than in hard luck. When Mr. Schmidt died and left his young widow with two children, she was, consequently, quite rich. But one misfortune followed another. One day the horse ran away, broke the wagon, jumped a steep bank into the river and was drowned. Then one of the cows ate poisonous herbs in the pasture and died.

The son Carl and the daughter Louise were very good children, but were too young to work in the field or to help much in earning a living. Consequently, at the time when we become acquainted with them, the widow had, as her principal source of livelihood, the cow and one pear tree. The rest of her land, excepting a small garden, she had been obliged to sell.

This year she saw no prospect of either fruit or garden crop. Potatoes, upon which she chiefly relied, seemed to be dying before they were ripe, and she was afraid that when Carl, who was now nine years old, went to dig them he would find none to put in his basket.

She was too proud to accept charity, and the fact of not being able to pay Mr. Stine for plowing the garden, as she had usually done, grieved her.

We have all heard the old sayings that "It never rains but it pours," "Misfortunes never come singly," and a number of other like expressions. They would certainly have applied to Mrs. Schmidt, for not only was the food supply about to give out, but the cow gave less milk and the neighbors were less able to buy. Still worse, Carl and Louise must have clothes, and her own clothing was nearly worn out.

There was a peddler named Scooper who went through the village every three weeks.

When he called at Mrs. Schmidt's house she wished to buy some clothes for the children and herself, but told him that as her crops were a failure this year she could not pay him until next season.

He said he would trust her, but did not say how long he would wait for his pay. He did this to get a chance to take her cow, as he was very grasping and hard hearted.

On his next call he demanded payment and made the sheriff notify her that if it was not paid in two weeks the peddler would take the cow for the money she owed him.

Before the cow was taken, Mrs. Schmidt had saved all the milk she could, and had kept it as long as possible, for she knew that she would now have neither milk to sell nor money to buy it for herself and the children.

For this reason she was so anxious about the milk that when an old woman came along the road and stopped at the gate, instead of offering her a drink of milk, as she always had done to those who called in need, she offered her a glass of water only.

The old lady looked so tired and sad that Carl and Louise ran out of the house, each bringing a glass of milk, and, as their mother had always taught them to be kind and generous, she had not the heart to reprove them.

The old lady looked very wistful at the milk, took the glass from Louise's hand and said, "Thank you, child." As soon as she drank the milk she seemed much younger.

When she had taken the glass from Carl she drank this also, and instead of being the old lady who had first appeared she was now young, handsome and very sunny faced.

While they looked at her with open mouthed astonishment she put her hand into a small pocket in her skirt, drew out a tiny pocketbook not larger than a lady's watch and said: "You did not expect any pay for the milk, but on account of your good will I can pay you the regular price and something more." She passed the pocketbook to Mrs. Schmidt and added: "This pocketbook will help you to buy many things which you need. Good-by."

When our friends opened the pocketbook they found one gold coin, which coin, in that land, had they expressed their money in dollars and cents, would have been worth about two dollars.

Of Interest to Women.

EDITED BY MISS F. V. DOANE.

The following clipping gives excellent advice. A word might be added concerning fur in the form of a fur cape. It is common now for ladies to keep their fur capes at hand instead of packing them away. They should be hung on a cape rest, and shaken and brushed occasionally. Ladies who have tried the plan of not packing a cape away have been pleased with the results, and have found the cape useful for cool evenings.

The unusual heat has driven the feminine mind to considering once more the summer problem of how to put away winter clothing securely, and how to ward off the attacks of that ravager, the house moth, for whose existance no one can find a reason.

The very first thing to observe in putting away winter clothes is that they are clean. Not dusted a little and shaken for a fraction of a second, but thoroughly and well cleaned. This is the large part of the secret of making a stronghold against the moth. In fact, many experienced housekeepers say that if garments are well treated in this respect they may safely be laid away without camphor, although many will prefer to take all precaution possible.

To clean a heavy garment it should be placed upon the line in the open air and thoroughly beaten with a rattan clothes beater or something of similar character. After being taken from the line a good brushing with a stiff brush is strictly in order. Afterwards clean the garment thoroughly whenever it needs cleaning with a sponge dipped in a solution of ammonia and water.

If the garment be a coat, the neckband should be well sponged, this part having often come in contact with the body. The pockets should be turned inside out, brushed till all particles of dust are dispersed, and then well sponged with the above solution. Each little flap or frill of a garment should be treated with scrupulous care in the same manner.

Why is all this cleansing necessary? Well, experienced housekeepers know the reason only too well, but for the younger members a word of explanation is necessary.

Wherever there is dust or any secretion, in that spot the moths congregate. The only way to provide against this is to render everything perfectly clean. The most lavish supply of camphor would not prevent destruction if this first requirement were not complied with.

When the garments have been thoroughly cleansed and shaken, wrap them away in newspapers. It is said that these insects dislike the printers' ink. Whether or not this be the true solution, certain it is that they make no attempt to invade newspaper packages of this kind.

Many women prefer to add the additional safeguard of camphor. Theis should be broken in small pieces, wrapped in newspaper, to prevent rapid evaporation, and laid in the box with the clothing, both under and above it. The tar balls which are sold at the apothecaries for the purpose are also good. They are cheaper than camphor and for that reason many women choose to substitute them. Any thing of this variety should be fo.ded in newspaper. There is one serious objection to the tar balls—one which suggests itself upon even distant acquaintance with them—the smell. There is small doubt in the minds of most women that the balls are able to ward off moths. They are strong enough for much more.

A great problem that! The preservation of furs. For a good piece of fur destroyed is far less easy to replace than trousers, skirt or jacket.

I interviewd Saturday a few well-knewn furriers upon the subject of putting them away. But the large establishments deal principally with the management of furs in numbers, and for that reason the following directions from experienced housekeepers seem best for the purpose of the page, which is to tell other housekeepers how.

All furs should be well beaten and brushed, being afterwards left for a few moments in a mild sunshine. The sun causes any moth which may be in the skin to rise to the surface and take wing. After thorough cleansing in this way the furs are wrapped in newspapers and surrounded with camphor as in the case of ordinary woolens.

It is not generally known that cedar wood is an excellent article for warding off moths. Cedar is somewhat expensive. A plain cedar chest without carving and of the ordinary size, is, however, pretty well within the reach of us all, and repays many times the money expended on it in the end.

These chests are simply invaluable in preserving winter clothing during the summer. In a cedar chest, camphor would be thrown away. In fact, some people who can afford the necessary outlay are having "cedar rooms" made for keeping the woolen garments during the hot months. These are small rooms or closets lined entirely with this wood.

Mrs. Cleveland's Mail.

Washington, May 22.—So large is the volume of material which comes with each mail from north, south, east and west addressed to Mrs. Cleveland that it has been found necessary to divide into classes those letters which appear deserving of any notice whatever.

First in this category comes the requests for charity in numberless forms. Appeals for money are abundant, of course.

A second class of letters are those in which Mrs. Cleveland is brought to use her influence with the President to procure offices or other political favors for somebody in whom the

FRIDAY EVENING, JULY 17, 1896.

EX-GOVERNOR WILLIAM E. RUSSELL was found dead in his bed yesterday morning near St. Adelaide, P. Q., where he was in camp for a rest after the hard work of the Chicago convention. He had retired apparently as well as usual, but passed away some time in the night, probably from heart disease.

THE Boston Daily Standard, which was started some time ago as the professed organ of the A. P. A., suspended publication with last Saturday's issue, a result which was forestalled when the paper started by those who knew the temper of Massachusetts people. There never have been enough sympathizers with the so-called patriotic orders to afford such a paper material support for any length of time, and when private individuals wearied of paying the bills the inevitable followed.

BRYAN and Sewall is the ticket nominated by the Democrats at Chicago last week; William Jennings Bryan of Nebraska and Arthur Sewall of Maine. The convention declared for free silver by a large majority, far exceeding the expectations of the country at large, a move which will cost the party many votes in November. The nomination of Bryan was one of the unexpected turns of the wheel of fortune which now and than astonish all in any way connected therewith. He was not even among the mentioned possibilities at the beginning of the convention, but a magnetic speech of his brought the delegates flocking to his support, and he was nominated on the fifth ballot.

THERE are indications that the shake-up which resulted in dropping Chairman Perkins from the state highway commission will operate to deprive Palmer of the strip of state highway which was promised it this year. Prof. Shaler, who is taking an active part in the workings of the commission this year, did not visit Palmer with the other members last year. He is evidently the controlling force now, and the commission has adopted the plan of extension rather than the building of new strips. Warren gets $9000 for a beginning, but it is said this is the only place in this vicinity where new road will be constructed. Those who are interested in the matter have not given up hope, however, but are still working for a strip for Palmer this year.

AS THE time for the discussion of local politics approaches, the question of the senatorial nomination begins to interest the Republicans of Eastern Hampden. For a long time it has been known that Messrs. Young, Bradford and Harvey of Springfield were in the race, but this week a new name has been presented, that of W. W. Leach of Palmer, and since the announcement that he would be a candidate he has had no little encouragement from various sections of the district. And it certainly seems as though Palmer ought to have the privilege of naming the candidate this year, as the town has not named one since 1879, and Eastern Hampden has sent only one senator since that time, Mr. Cushman of Monson in 1892. N. S. Hubbard of Brimfield was the nominee in 1891, but was defeated. The basis of representation has usually been Springfield four years and Eastern Hampden two years, but previous to 1892 Springfield sent the senator six years in succession, and three years in succession since then. With this showing Eastern Hampden would seem entitled to the nomination this year. Mr. Leach, who has served in the lower branch of the Legislature, would well represent the interests of the district in a seat in the higher branch, and his friends will endeavor to bring about his recognition by the other sections of the district.

THE county commissioners will meet the first Tuesday in August to begin the work of arranging the thirteen new representative districts for the next ten years. Their task will not be an easy one. The present average number of voters for a district is about 1800, but the increase in population makes 2428 the average for the new apportionment. The territory east of Springfield is at present divided into two districts, the ninth—Monson, Wilbraham, Wales, East Longmeadow and Longmeadow—with 1949 voters, and the tenth—Palmer, Ludlow, Brimfield and Holland—with 1882, and it would be desirable to keep this territory by itself, though the increased number of voters required for a district renders this practically impossible. A glance at the map will show that the most natural disposition of the matter would be to put Palmer, Monson, Brimfield, Wales and Holland into one district with 2537 voters. These towns make a compact territory, with no branching arms or irregular boundaries, whose interests are closely allied, a point not to be lost sight of. The remaining towns of Ludlow, Wilbraham, Hampden, Longmeadow and East Longmeadow would only have 1293 voters, and would need a ward of Springfield or Chicopee added to make the required average. Other sections of the county are not a little anxious as to their associates for the coming ten years, and the whole matter will be likely to give the county commissioners no little trouble before they reach a decision.

IN THE QUEEN'S DOMAINS.

A Charming Trip to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

It was a jolly company, just one hundred and two strong, which gathered at Boston, on the deck of the steamship Boston of the Yarmouth line, on Monday, June 29th, preparing to enjoy to the utmost the joint excursion of the Massachusetts and the Suburban Press associations. Staterooms were already assigned and it was but the work of a moment to get ourselves in shape for the full enjoyment of the voyage before us. The lines are cast off at noon, and as we start down the harbor the piers are black with people and the stream full of crowded and gaily decked craft, gathered to give a rousing send-off, not to the press gang, but to Boston's Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co., just starting for Europe on the big Cunarder Servia, which leaves her pier just behind us. At this point the dinner bell has an attractive sound to us, and we fortify ourselves for the swell of old ocean by an excellent and substantial repast. This is the first trip of the Boston this season, and when outside the harbor we stop and circle about while the compasses are adjusted. While thus engaged the boom of cannon is heard from Fort Warren in salute to the Ancients as the Servia steams past, and there is a great blowing of whistles from the numerous vessels surrounding her as she drops her pilot and starts out to sea, finally disappearing from view as our courses diverge.

There is now opportunity for inspecting our ship, which is as spick and span and sweet as a bride, and Captain Stanwood and all the officers are as efficient and attentive as could be desired. The day is perfect, the sail delightful and invigorating, with nothing but sky and water and an occasional sail visible. The water is smooth, but the swell is there all the same, and a number of the party gradually conclude to seek the seclusion of their staterooms and assume a horizontal position to quiet the threatened uprising in their epigastric regions. Others remain undisturbed on deck, but even to some of these the supper bell has no charms, and others who indulge their appetites regret it later. We have a glimpse of a finback whale, as he comes up to spout, and a glorious sunset, as we speed on almost directly east, and as the evening shades gather about us we yield to the conviction that our berth is the best place for us, and turn in to be cradled to sleep as the vessel rolls us back and forth.

Everybody is astir betimes on Tuesday morning, for we are steaming up the narrow river at Yarmouth, with wide mud flats on either side, as the tide is out, and we are soon at the pier, where President Baker of the steamship company stands waiting to extend a cordial welcome to the party. We land at about seven o'clock and walk to the Grand Hotel, the cool, bracing air whetting our appetites so that we fully appreciate the excellent breakfast there served. After breakfast the citizens come with their carriages and take us for a drive about the town. It is quite an attractive spot for one desiring rest and fine air, a very comfortable place to spend a week or two it strikes us. There is a noticeable lack of recent paint on the houses, though the place is by no means gone to decay. The roads are fine and hard, just the place for wheelmen. Hawthorn hedges abound, and grow luxuriantly. So do the daisies and buttercups, and even a New Englander will open his eyes at the snow-white fields of the former and the golden masses of the latter. They have good horses down this way, too, and the way our buckboard load is whirled around the city is quite refreshing. We are left at the station of the Dominion Atlantic Railway, where special cars are provided to take us to Digby, 60 miles distant. We only have a glimpse of this town, but it is sufficient to show us that it must be a delightful place for a vacation, located as it is on a side hill with the beautiful waters of the Annapolis basin spread out at its feet. Here we take the steamer Prince Rupert to cross the Bay of Fundy. We begin with an excellent dinner and then go on deck to enjoy the scenery as we pass through Digby Gap. The bay developed a rattling breeze for our benefit and the whitecaps put on an extra frill as they dashed clear over the boat. But it was a glorious sail, and everybody fell in love with the steamer, a low and long sidewheeler, elegantly fitted up, and with 3000 horse-power engines which sends her through the water at a marvelous pace, the 45½ miles to St. John being covered in a little over two hours.

At St. John we proceed at once to the Canadian Pacific station and take special cars for Fredericton, 60 miles inland, where we arrive at seven o'clock and are quartered at the Queen and Barker houses, both good. This is the capital of New Brunswick, attractively located on the St. John river, with a population of some 8000. The parliament building is a fine structure, and there is quite an imposing Church-of-England cathedral. The royal school of infantry is located here, the red coats giving the streets somewhat of a martial aspect. We share in the strong regret expressed by the citizens because we cannot spend a day here, but our itinerary does not permit it, and at 7 o'clock Wednesday morning we are aboard the comfortable steamer David Weston, for a sail of nearly 84 miles down the St. John to the city of the same name. The day, river and scenery are as charming as possible, and it is a delightful sail. Past tidy farms and quiet settlements we sail, occasionally making a landing, and frequently stopping the wheels for a moment while a row boat pulls up to the steamer and transfers passengers, mail, eggs, sheep or produce destined for the market. This is Dominion Day, the anniversary of the union of the colonies, and we are struck by the loyal patriotism of the people as manifested by the display of flags. Almost every farmhouse has a good staff and a good-sized British flag flying from it.

The lower part of the river finds its way through imposing mountain gorges, and a turn in the stream brings to view the city of our destination, where we take electrics for our hotels, the party being divided between the Aberdeen, Royal and Victoria houses. The writer was quartered at the Royal, and it is a royal house indeed, thoroughly up to date in all its furnishings and appointments, pervaded by an air of quiet elegance and refinement, and furnishing a menu second to none in excellence. Being a holiday the stores are closed and the streets as deserted and quiet as a graveyard, everybody being away at some picnic or social gathering. We stroll about the city, enjoy a pleasant reunion in the parlors of the Royal in the evening, and after a good night's rest, a delicious breakfast and the purchase of a few souvenirs, are ready for a drive about the city in open barouches which the International Steamship Co. generously furnished the next morning. This is a substantial city of nearly 50,000 inhabitants, showing no traces of the disastrous fire which in 1877 swept away some 1600 buildings. There are hills innumerable, and consequently many sightly places. We visit the new park and cross the suspension bridge which, with its near neighbor, the railroad cantilever bridge, spans the gorge through which, 70 feet below, rush the pent-up waters of the mighty St. John. This is the one and only reversible waterfall. When the tide is out the river pours over a descent of 15 feet, but when high tide comes (a rise of 30 feet here, you know) this is reversed. At half tide only can vessels pass through on level water.

The steamship company does nothing by halves. At noon we are deposited at the pier to enjoy a most excellent dinner on the State of Maine, which is to bring us back to the Hub, and we are through and ready to enjoy the sail when, at 2 o'clock, the lines are cast off and we bid good-bye to foreign shores, and also to our genial conductor, F. K. Robbins of the Yarmouth Steamship Company, who has been our constant companion so far, and has demonstrated his ability to take the very best of care of a big party and keep them all good natured. May his shadow never grow less! Out into the Bay of Fundy we sail again, skirting the coast all the afternoon. We reach Eastport about 5, and have half an hour in which to take a hasty stroll through the quaint town, the most easterly one in the United States, where thousands of herring are smoked, and other thousands become "sardines." We also touch at Lubec, and then start direct for Boston as night and our first fog close about us. But what care we? We are well housed and carefully guided by our commander, Capt. W. A. Colby, whose pride in his ship is well founded. She is a side-wheeler, much like our Sound steamers, only built for rougher purpose, and is comfortable and complete in every respect. The table, too, is unusually good, and on this occasion the dining hall was graced by an elegant wreath tied with pink ribbon, bearing the words, "The pen is mightier than the sword."

Not until 3 o'clock Friday afternoon do we sight land. But we have had an elegant sail, and when at 5 o'clock the gang plank is run out and we bid adieus it is with sincere regret that the delightful trip is over. Weather and everything have been as favorable as possible. May the next excursion be as pleasant,—and may we be there! C. B. F.

NEW HIGH SCHOOL COURSE

With it the Palmer High School Will Rank Among the Highest in Massachusetts Outside the Cities.

The school board held a meeting Tuesday evening, and among other matters adopted a new course of study for the high school, by which scholars will be fitted either for college, technical schools or normal schools. This is a thing rarely done in country high schools, and by this action the board has placed the Palmer high school well at the head of the list of high schools outside the cities. The course is as follows:

The figures at the right of each study indicate the number of lessons during the year. It will be seen that while the new outline provides a higher education than ever before for those who wish to take a four-years' course, the three-years' course has been specially planned with reference to the large number who leave school after three years of work, giving them an education which few attain with so few years of study.

The board voted to fit up the east recitation room on the first floor of the high school building as a chemical laboratory, with sink, etc., and all the science recitations will be held there, the room accommodating about 20 pupils. Additional recitation room will be had by utilizing the tower room on the second floor.

Miss Nellie Smith was appointed teacher of the Forest Lake school, which is to be opened in September.

Bids for the transportation of pupils to the high school were opened, and the contract at Three Rivers given to J. F. Twiss, that at Bondsville going to Jerry Shea. Owing to a misunderstanding of the conditions, all bids for Thorndike were rejected, and new ones called for.

Palmer Clerks Victorious.

Perhaps the Palmer people have noticed that the clerks in this village have always done up their bundles neat and nice. Well, if they had been at Flynt's Park in Monson yesterday afternoon they would have seen them "do up" the ball nine of clerks from Stafford Springs in the same way, neat and nice and easy, by the score of 15 to 2. A good crowd was in attendance and showed much enthusiasm considering the one-sidedness of the game. The ducks and other birds in the cages across the road also showed an interest in the game, and whenever a good play was made manifested their appreciation by sending a mixture of hoarse melodies to the players' ears. The only thing to mar the beauty of the game was the umpiring of Doctor Rafftery, who evidently knew little about baseball and let his anxiety for Stafford to win to get the better part of his judgment. In the very beginning of the game it was evident that Palmer had an easy thing, and no one exerted himself beyond keeping the score of the other side down. In the first three innings Palmer scored 11 runs, and later in the game scored 4 more because they couldn't help it. Stafford scored one in the fourth and one in the fifth. The only feature of the game was the pitching of Sugrue. He went into the box in the fifth with three men on bases and one out, and retired the next two batters on strikers, pitching just six balls. At another time he retired the side on five pitched balls. Certainly the clerks played a good game and upheld the honor of the Palmer business men, and no doubt if their employers could only realize it they would raise their salaries. The score:

Innings,	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Palmer,	6	4	1	0	1	2	1	0	0	—15

Death of Mrs. N. A. Learned.

Mrs. N. A. Learned passed away yesterday morning after a long and painful illness. She was born in Belchertown and was the daughter of Martin and Mary Sedgwick, of whom the latter survives her. She also leaves a brother, H. G. Sedgwick of Athol, and three sisters, Mrs. James A. Jones of Denver, Col., Mrs. E. D. Cushman and Mrs. Rufus Fay of Monson.

Mrs. Learned, with her pleasing manner, readily found her way to the hearts of a wide circle of friends, who recognized in her the true Christian woman. True to the Christian principles instilled into her mind in childhood, she bore with patience the sufferings of later years, looking forward with confidence to the reunion with loved ones gone before. A true daughter, loyal friend and faithful Christian, she hears the "well done" of the Master, and enters into the rest prepared for "those who love His appearing." The deceased was a member of the Congregational church in this place, with which she united about 18 months ago. The funeral services will be held from her late residence to-morrow afternoon at 2.30; the burial will be private, at Monson.

A Saturday Night Blaze.

A succession of short blasts of a locomotive whistle awakened a number of people in the vicinity of Main street about 11 last Saturday night, and soon after an alarm of fire from box 76, the carpet mill, brought them out of bed. All who heard the alarm thought that the carpet mill must be on fire, and many hastened thitherwards, only to find that the blaze was in one of the barns on the Gamwell farm above the mill, occupied by Patrick Carey. The fire apparatus responded to the call, but before it reached the scene of the fire was stopped and sent back. The rear axle of the hook and ladder truck broke at the corner of Park and School streets on account of the weight of the many persons who had jumped on to obtain a ride to the fire. As there was nothing with which to stop the progress of the flames, the fire destroyed the barn in which it started and also the one beside it, with all their contents, which consisted of hay and two wagons. It is supposed that the fire started from combustion in the hay. The loss is about $700. The buildings were insured for $300 in the Merchants' of Newark.

Stolen Wheel Found.

Charles L. Johnson's bicycle, which was stolen from the farm of C. D. Foster on the Thorndike road last week, was found by Mr. Johnson in Bondsville, Tuesday. The wheel had changed hands five times since being stolen, the man in whose possession it was found buying it for $5. The thief was tracked as far as Montague by Sheriff Studley.

H. A. McFarland Gets It.

The question of who would receive the appointment of special justice of the district court of Eastern Hampden, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of George H. Newton of Monson, has been settled by the naming of Herbert A. McFarland of Wales for the position.

The house of Mrs. Lyman Dimock on Park street has been shingled.

J. J. Shea has opened his "Bon Ton Quick Lunch" room in Caryl's block.

The army worm has not yet been reported in this immediate vicinity, although it has appeared at Belchertown, and local farmers are hoping to be spared this pest. It makes its appearance suddenly, from no one seems to know where, but its presence is soon apparent. It eats every green thing with which it comes in contact, leaving a path of devastation in its rear. It is a hard thing to fight, but the best way is said to be the digging or plowing of a ditch with one straight side in the path of the worms, the straight side to be from the direction of their approach. They are said to be unable to climb this perpendicular side, and will accumulate in the ditch, where straw can be piled on them, kerosene poured over it and then burned.

The electric railroad has been completed as far as Penfield's studio on East Main street, and cars began running regularly Wednesday morning. The cars leave Warren beginning at six o'clock in the morning, and then every forty minutes until 11 o'clock at night. The work of construction is finished for the present, with the exception of putting up the fences. It is understood that the Boston and Albany railroad has agreed to begin soon on the bridge over the railroad, and when completed the electric road will be continued to West Warren at once.

A CARD.—We wish to extend our grateful acknowledgements to the many friends and neighbors for all their kindly remembrances in thought and deed throughout our recent affliction and bereavement.

MRS. J. M. TUCKER AND FAMILY.
Monson, Mass.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Mr. G. Cailloutte, druggist, Beaversville, Ill., says: "To Dr. King's New Discovery I owe my life. Was taken with la grippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail, and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. Won't keep store or house without it." Get a free trial of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Mrs. Rhodie Noah, of this place, was taken in the night with cramping pains and the next day diarrhoea set in. She took half a bottle of blackberry cordial but got no relief. She then sent to me to see if I had anything that would help her. I sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and the first dose relieved her. Another of our neighbors had been sick for about a week and had tried different remedies for diarrhoea but kept getting worse. I sent him this same remedy. Only four doses of it were required to cure him. He says he owes his recovery to this wonderful remedy.—Mrs. Mary Sibley, Sidney, Mich. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Last summer one of our grandchildren was sick with a severe bowel trouble. Our doctor's remedies had failed, then we tried Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Dirrahoea Remedy, which gave very speedy relief. We regard it as the best medicine ever put on the market for bowel complaints.—Mrs. E. G. Gregory, Fredericktown, Mo. This certainly is the best medicine ever put on the market for dysentery, summer complaint, colic and cholera infantum in children. It never fails to give prompt relief when used in reasonable time and the plain printed directions are followed. Many mothers have expressed their sincere gratitude for the cures it has effected. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney' Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Chamberlain's Cough Remedy cures colds, croup and whooping cough. It is pleasant, safe and reliable. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige and Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike, William Kennedy, Ware.

There's no Danger to be feared, even if you do use too much Pearline in the washing. If there's any danger of damage at all, it's when you use too little. In that case, you'll have to begin that dreadful rubbing—and carloads of Pearline couldn't do as much damage to your clothes as that will. Follow the directions on the package—that's the best way of all. But remember, too much won't hurt anything. It's only a waste of good Pearline.

THE SULTAN'S LAST CHESS GAME.

even as the beginning of a fire which neglected would waste a city, may be quenched with the contents of a bucket. Let me, your majesty, take 500 janissaries with me, proceed with all speed to Adrianople, and two hours after my arrival the leaders of the plot will be executed and the movement will be at an end."

The sultan approved this reasoning and the advice given him by his new grand vizier, and bade him start at once on the mission he had proposed.

Within an hour the grand vizier, with his escort of 500 men, left the capital; Osman, as he parted with his friend, the reis effendi, observing simply: "The game of chess is adjourned."

The grand vizier, on reaching Adrianople, proceeded immediately to the house of the governor of Rumelia, and had him executed on the spot. Having also put to death several of his creatures and officials who had been guilty of the grossest tyranny and extortion, and also those who had been in any way implicated in the projected uprising, he placed, to the great joy of all, his father in his former position of governor of Rumelia, and hastened back to report to his majesty that the province was now perfectly contented and loyal.

The sultan was delighted with the promptitude and energy of his new grand vizier. He began from this time to rely on his judgment and to take his advice on every occasion, and for a time Osman ruled the empire with unquestionable authority and conspicuous success. Murad often commanded the presence of his grand vizier at the chessboard; but the stakes to be played for were always fixed within the bounds of reason and moderation, and whether the game was lost or won—and Osman was too prudent often to win—the terrible claws of the imperial tiger remained sheathed in velvet.

This happy state of affairs continued some time, and might perhaps have continued indefinitely had not the Bostanji Bashi, in revenge for some imaginary slight or unintentional discourtesy on the part of the grand vizier, contrived his downfall. This was a task not difficult to be achieved with a master such as Murad. A few words alluding to "the policy and aims of our new ruler," which he was allowed to overhear, excited the jealousy and suspicion of the sultan. And with him the interval between jealousy and suspicion, and the determination to rid himself of the object of them, was short indeed. He determined at once that Osman should play again for his head, and that this time he should lose.

On the same afternoon he took occasion, on winning a game, to address Osman as follows: "My good grand vizier, I notice that in these little friendly contests of ours you seldom win. Now, I like not to play with one who puts not out his full strength." With a mocking smile he continued: "Probably the stakes are now too trivial to make it worth while for you to exert your full powers. This must be remedied. I on my part will stake one of my daughters; you shall, if you win, have her to wife, and with her a dowry of 200 purses of gold. And you on your side must, I suppose, play for the stake you played for at first, and then, you remember, you won in five moves, and easily enough."

"Your majesty," said Osman, who saw at once that the temper of the sultan had changed, and who entertained no doubt but that his own fate was already determined upon, "whatever stakes you decree must, of course, be accepted, but this time I have no new gambit to pit against your unrivaled and over-victorious skill."

The sultan appreciated the compliment, but it did not cause him to alter his decision.

The afternoon of the next day was fixed as the time appointed for the playing of this fateful game. During the interval Osman pondered deeply on the best course to pursue in the predicament in which he now found himself. He was in little doubt that, even though he should win this game, another equally momentous would follow, and that nothing could avail to keep his head on his shoulders if Murad had, as he shrewdly suspected, determined to get rid of him. Yet it was clear that, under these circumstances, to win would probably be less immediately fatal than to lose; it might for a short time delay, if it could not avert, the end that seemed inevitable. Therefore when on the following afternoon the grand vizier faced the sultan at the chess-board, each of these good players sat down determined to win if he possibly could manage it.

They were not alone. A large number of the great officers and high officials of the state and the palace sat watching the game which might so suddenly terminate the brief and brilliant career of one of the players. Every move was followed with the keenest interest. The game was fought with great skill and indomitable patience by both combatants. It lasted long, and the chances of victory and defeat still held an even balance.

It was the grand vizier's turn. He moved his piece, when suddenly it flashed upon him that the move was a mistaken one. Virtually it sealed his fate. Unless the sultan should, by some extraordinary obtuseness, overlook the opportunity afforded him, three moves would at once terminate the game and cut short the life of Osman. He dared not raise his eyes from the board, lest his glance should involuntarily betray to the sultan his consciousness of the blunder he had committed.

For some time the whole assembly sat silent and motionless. The sultan made no move. What could be the cause of his delay? Was he gloating over the assurance of victory and purposely prolonging the anxiety and apprehension of his victim? Or could it be possible that he really failed to observe the opportunity provided for him and was still considering undecided his next move?

The pause continued so long that Osman ventured at length to raise his eyes to his adversary. Rather than such suspense it would be preferable to know the worst. As he looked up a strange sight met his gaze. The sultan sat with his head bent down; the afternoon was sultry, and at the very crisis of the battle he had fallen asleep!

There was little doubt that when he woke the first glance must reveal the opportunity that was presented to him. Meanwhile, none dared to disturb him, and the unhappy Osman was compelled to wait, with as much patience and fortitude as he could command, the tragic and inevitable result. No man in that large assembly either spoke or stirred. With calm, unruffled demeanor, truly Oriental, they sat silent and watchful till the sultan should awake and deign to continue the game which his sleep had so suddenly interrupted. Silence reigned in the court without no less than within the hall itself.

At length the call to prayer of the muezzin on the mosque resounded through the heavy air: "Come to prayer, come to prayer. God is most great, God is most great. There is no God but God." Still the sultan slept, and no one in that bejeweled crowd dared to disturb his slumber.

At last an incident that none could have forseen occurred to break the silence. One of the soldiers stationed at the door followed unconsciously the example set him by his imperial master and fell asleep, and suddenly his scimiter, falling from his relaxing grasp, fell clanging upon the marble steps.

All looked up with amazement; all except Murad.

Then Osman rose and touched the sultan lightly on the shoulder, and he fell forward with a crash among the chessmen—for he was dead.—H. N. Crellin, in San Francisco Argonaut.

NO BLOT I' THE 'SCUTCHEON FOR HER.—Two ragged little boys and a little girl, all about seven or eight years old, were playing on a cellar door near Fifteenth and Dickinson streets the other day. One little fellow snuggled up to the little girl and said: "Say, Maggie, you like me, don't you?" "Yes," said the girl, with prompt candor; "your fadder don't get drunk and break things." A scornful look at the other little boy accompanied this remark. The second urchin fidgeted uneasily. His little chin began to quiver, but he manfully put his fate to test. He looked up appealingly into the girl's face, and asked: "Don't you love me a little, Maggie?" The little maiden drew her ragged skirt about her with a gesture of womanly pride, and said: "No, Tommy, I could never love a man w'at I couldn't respeck 'is fadder."—Philadelphia Record.

Bicycle Ballad of Boston.

Miss Jane Penelope Brewster, of lineage running back
To ancient Plymouth's founders, with never a flaw nor crack,
Supposedly daft on Browning, Emerson and Thoreau,
Very select, correctly cold, and all that stuff, you know;
Never appearing in public without a chaperon,
Loaded with B. C. wisdom, but to modern larks unknown,
Suddenly caused the Boston mind to totter, quake and reel
By riding out through the Back Bay fens, mounted upon a wheel!
Gay society snickered, cultured society wept,
Still on her awful downward course Miss J. B. Brewster kept;
Her long skirts soon gave way to short; bloomers succeeded those;
What did they say on Beacon street? That's too much to suppose.
Pleadings and solid argument, ridicule, cuts and scoff
Fell to her lot, but still she went reeling "centuries" off;
Soon she was winning prizes; her intimates full of pain,
Finally let her pedal; said she had "wheel on the brain."
But after a while what happened? Jenny shook off her shell,
Got acquainted with real folks, grew to be plump and well;
Found out something about the world that's whirling along to-day,
Read an occasional novel, didn't despise the play;
When the season was over, the girls of her set
Found she'd married the very man they all had hoped to get.
Instead of wheel on the brain, the facts in the case reveal
That when Miss Brewster rode there was a massive brain on the wheel!

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

Now, the three had looked in this pocketbook and had seen but one piece of money; so, when, on taking out this coin, there still remained one in the pocketbook, they were very much surprised.

To be sure that the coin in the pocketbook was as good as the one which had been laid upon the table, Carl picked it out and laid it beside the first.

Instead of one there were now two coins in the pocketbook. Louise drew out these also.

Soon, however, the widow Schmidt looked again, and, behold, instead of two coins, there were now three in the pocketbook. Then she knew that the old lady was a fairy in disguise, and that the fairy pocketbook would always have three coins in it—one for herself, one for Carl and one for Louise.

When the fairy said "Good-by" to Mrs. Schmidt, she followed the peddler to the next village and determined to do Mr. Scooper a kindness by teaching him a lesson which he would never forget.

Mr. Scooper had just hitched his horse before a house in the next village, when he noticed that the rope by which the cow had been tied behind the wagon had slipped off her horns.

He took hold of the cow's horns to lead her to the rope and again tie her to the wagon.

The cow immediately started toward home, and, being so much stronger than Mr. Scooper, he was unable to stop her.

The cow ran faster and faster, until Mr. Scooper was unable to keep his feet and sailed through the air, holding on to the horns from which, try as he would, he could not let go.

"Now," said a voice, "until you can be a better man, you must keep hold of the cow."

Mr. Scooper was so thoroughly frightened that he then and there resolved to become a better man and to give Mrs. Schmidt back her cow. As soon as he had decided to do this his hands relaxed their hold, and he was free to leave the cow in her own stable and return to his wagon in the next village.

In the morning our fairy friend who had spent the night at Mrs. Schmidt's house told Mrs. Schmidt that she was very fond of potatoes and would like very much to have some for breakfast.

The potato was so large both the children could not pick it up.

Mrs. Schmidt said the plants seemed to be dying, and that the potatoes were so small as not to be worth digging, but she would do the best she could. Accordingly she took a hoe and went out into the garden.

Mrs. Schmidt commenced to dig, and what was her surprise to find a potato so large that both the children could not pick it up, and, after having dug the dirt away, it took all her strength to pull it out of its place in the ground.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

A HERD OF DEHORNED COWS.

Describing the herd of cows belonging to Moses Ellis of Framingham, the Boston Ploughman notes that the cattle have all been dehorned. It says: Mr. Ellis has the operation performed by a veterinarian who uses a pair of heavy clippers made for the purpose. The cows do not appear to suffer much. The wound soon heals and there is no more fighting, scratching and prodding when the large herd is turned out to pasture or driven to water. A western agricultural lecturer, who has had experience in treating his own herd, says, in speaking of the effects of dehorning:—

"Usually cows will shrink on their milk about two milkings; some not at all. I never had one shrink as much as she would from standing in a cold storm for two hours. The head soon heals. Some bleed profusely, others but little. In fly time I have daubed the head with tar to avoid the risk from flies. Some say the cows are more quiet and kind when dehorned. I have not found it so. The disposition remains about the same. They simply cannot harm each other, nor other stock.

"All this for horns that are already grown; but there is a better way, if you begin soon enough. Take the calf when you can just feel the horns through the hair; clip the hair off the horn, take a stick of caustic potash and wind with paper all but a little end, so as not to burn the hand. Dip the bare end of the stick into a little water, just enough to moisten it. Then rub on the horn for, say, a minute or two. That ends the growth of the horn. This seems the easiest and most humane way of removing the horns."

Those who, like Mr. Ellis, buy most of their cattle instead of raising them, will be obliged to dehorn the full-grown animals, but the measure will, no doubt, prove humane when its value in preventing fights and worriment is considered.

THE EDITOR'S LITTLE JOKE.—The proprietors of the Scotsman had once to pay damages because their famous editor, Alexander Russell, in a leading article, called some local celebrity a "serpent." As the cailing of "bad" names is illegal in Scotland, Russell had practically no defense. Yet he made a fight, and on being worsted he went straight back to his office to attack the triumphant "serpent" anew. On his arrival, by a singular accident, he found on his table a pamphlet which the "serpent" had just issued. This pamphlet, then, he proceeded to make the subject of a leading article; and in it he presently noticed certain statistics which somehow were all wrong in their additions. So he quoted the statistics, pointed out their blunders and then wrote: "Thus, if Mr.—— is not a serpent, he yet seems to be a particularly bad adder."—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

"Don't you think," ventured the New Woman, as considerately as possible, "that you are pretty old to be still serving as the subject of jokes?"

Mary's little lamb shrugged his shoulders. "I do," he answered with warmth. "Why, every time I'm dragged into one of these things, I feel positively sheepish."—Detroit Free Press.

MARMALADE.

Oranges, which a few years ago were considered only a holiday fruit, are so plenty and so cheap that they are in very common use. The poorer the orange, the better the peel, or at least the lower grades of this fruit have a thick, meaty peel. Cannot something be done with all this wealth of golden color, which seems too handsome to throw away, and is useful to eat without great trouble in preparation?

A marmalade of apples and orange peel is made in this way: The orange peel is put in a stone jar, as it comes from the table. Make a weak brine, or a strong solution, with salt and hot water. Let it stand until cool, then turn it over the peels and keep the jar covered. Stir every day, to prevent the top pieces from molding. At the end of a week turn off the brine and cover with clear water. Change the water every day for another week, than drain in a colander and boil until tender. Change the water often while boiling. When the peels are again drained and chopped very fine, to every quart of chopped orange peel add two quarts of chopped sour apples. Make a sirup of sugar and hot water, using in the proportion of four pounds of sugar and one-half pint of water to one quart of orange and two quarts of apple. Put the fruit into the hot sirup and boil over a slow fire, stirring constantly. Cook until clear and thick. Remove from the fire, and when partly cold add the juice of three lemons. Stir for fifteen minutes. It is then ready to put up in jelly tumblers. Pack each tumbler so that it shall be quite solid. When quite cold cover with papers wet in brandy, and keep from the air with a second paper tied on closely. This paper cover is much better than the tin cover that comes with the jelly tumbler. This rule will make from ten to twelve tumblerfuls, and will keep in a cool dry place for a long time.—Good Housekeeping.

As his feet touched dry land again Jonah turned and shook his fist at the whale. "You have found out," he said, "that you can't keep a good man down."—Chicago Tribune.

Katy's Questions.

"'Way down in the buttercup meadow
I saw a white baa-sheep to-day,
And close by her side, in the clover,
A dear little lamb was at play.
Does the sheep-mamma love her white lammie
Just as you love me?" Say, mamma, say?"
"Yes, Katie, yes,
So I guess."

"In the orchard, up in the old pear tree,
There are four little birds in a nest;
Willie says they belong to the robin
That has a red bib on her breast.
In all the great, wide world of birdies,
Does she love her own birdie the best?"
"Yes, birdie, yes,
So I guess."

"The last time I played in the garden,
There was just one red rose to be seen;
But to-day there's a tiny pink rosebud,
Wrapped in a blanket of green.
Does the rose want to kiss Baby Rosebud,
When she tries far over to lean?"
"Yes, baby, yes,
So I guess."

"Last night I peeped out at the window,
Just before I repeated my prayer,
And the moon, with a star close behind her,
Was walking high up in the air.
Did God make the little star baby
'Cause the moon was so lonely up there?"
"Yes, darling, yes,
So I guess."

MARY ELLEN'S BLACKBERRYING.

Mary Ellen was going blackberrying.

"Now, don't get over the line-fence," cautioned her mother, as she tied on her gingham sunbonnet and took her basket. "Mr. Brooks owns the land on the other side, an' you know he'n your pa ain't on good terms, an' I s'pose he'd be real mad if you got 'crost the line. I know your pa'd be, so be real careful."

"Why ain't they on good terms?" asked Mary Ellen.

"I dun'no," answered Mrs. Leith, "'n I don't b'leeve they do. They had some trouble years ago, 'n both of 'em's so set that neither one of 'em will give in a mite 'n admit he was wrong, 'n so they jest made up their minds to have nothin' to do with each other, 'n they ain't spoke fer years 'n years, 'n I don't suppose they ever will. It'd be a merricle if they did."

"Mr. Brooks looks like a real nice man," said Mary Ellen.

"He is a real nice man," responded her mother. "So's yer pa. The whole neighborhood 'll say that 'bout both of 'em, but it don't hender 'em from bein' set 'n contrary. It us't to be dreadful unpleasant to me to think o' bein' on sech terms with a man whose land jined ours, 'n who had the good will of all his neighbors 'cept your pa; but I got us't to it, 'n I don't mind it much now, though I can't help wishin' they'd let ev'rything drop 'n be frien's. It don't seem right fer men who was brought up together to be at s'ord's p'ints with each other, as the sayin' goes. They us't to b'long to the same church, but Mr. Brooks he left 'n went over to the Free-Will church after the trouble begun. I felt jest as if it was like crowdin' him out of his home, somehow, but ef he hadn't gone yer pa would, I s'pose."

Mary Ellen took her basket and set out on her search for berries with a thoughtful expression on her face. She was thinking over what her mother had told her about the trouble which had existed for more years than she could remember.

"It don't seem worth while to be enemies," said Mary Ellen to herself.

Mary Ellen had seen Mr. Brooks several times of late, and he had such a pleasant face that she couldn't help thinking that she would like him very much if she knew him better.

"I do wish he an' pa'd make up," she said, as she climbed the fence of the "blackberry lot." "It don't seem right, an' it ain't right, for neighbors to not speak to each other. I wonder if both of 'em ain't sorry about it, if they'd tell the truth?"

Mary Ellen found that some one had been ahead of her, and that but few blackberries had been left for her to gather.

"Dear me, I hoped I'd get my basket full," she said. "but I ain't goin' to find a quart, at this rate. I ought to have come a little sooner."

"Can't you find any berries, sis?" asked a voice from across the line fence.

Mary Ellen gave a little jump when she heard it, partly because it was unexpected, and startled her, and partly because it was the voice of Mr. Brooks, about whom she had been thinking.

"I ain't found many yet," she replied. "Somebody has got the start of me, I guess."

"There's a good many over on this side," said Mr. Brooks. "You're welcome to 'em. Climb over an' I'll help you fill your basket."

Mary Ellen put her foot on the fence to climb over, and then she remembered her mother's caution about not getting across the line, and hesitated.

"Ain't you comin'?" asked Mr. Brooks.

"I-I'm afaid pa wouldn't like it," answered Mary Ellen, blushing to the roots of her hair as she said it.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" said Mr. Brooks, sharply. "I know how your father feels to'rds me, but I didn't s'pose he'd set up a little girl like you against me."

"He hain't said anything about you to me. He never did, truly, but ma—"

"But your mother did, eh?" and Mr. Brooks scowled so that the pleasant look was all gone from his face.

"No, she didn't," answered Mary Ellen. "She said she was sorry about it, an' always had b'en, but she told me not to get over the fence 'cause pa wouldn't like it. I'd like to come over, an' ma wouldn't care, but pa might, you see, so I guess I hadn't better."

"Well, yo' can do jest as yo' like about it," said Mr. Brooks, turning away from the fence.

It was quite evident to Mary Ellen that he was quite angry.

"I—I'm real sorry," began Mary Ellen, looking through the fence, longingly, at some fine clusters of blackberries on the other side.

"I hope you don't blame me, 'cause I don't come. "If I knew pa'd be willin', I'd come in a minute. I—I guess I'd like you real well when I get 'quainted."

Mr. Brooks turned and came back to the fence.

"I didn't have no call to be cross to you," he said. "I know you ain't to blame. I'm sorry I spoke so. I guess you're a nice little girl; an' if you don't feel free to come over on my side o' the fence, we can mannidge to git 'long on friendly terms with the fence between us, though 't ain't so agreeable as 't might be. You jest pick all the berries you find on your side, 'n I'll pick what I find on this, 'n put 'em into your basket, 'n mebbe we can git it full, after all."

So it happened that Mary Ellen picked blackberries on one side of the fence and Mr. Brooks picked blackberries on the other, and dropped them into her basket whenever he got a handful; and as they picked and talked, and very soon—before she realized it, in fact—Mary Ellen felt very well acquainted with Mr. Brooks.

"See," she said, holding up her basket for his inspection, as the sun began to cast lengthening shadows across the blackberry lot, "we've got it most full. If you hadn't helped me, I wouldn't have had near [as many. I'm ever so much obliged to you, Mr. Brooks. I like you real well, 'n I've had an awful nice time."

"So've I," answered Mr. Brooks. "I hope you'll come ag'in. By day after to-morrer there'll be lots more ripe. I don't want you to come over on my side o' the fence ef your father hain't willin' ye should, but I hain't no objections to yer sayin' to him that I told ye you was welcome to all the berries ye could pick. I hain't nothin' against you nor yer mother."

"Thank you," said Mary Ellen. "I'll tell him what you said. I'm awful sorry you an' he can't be friends."

"So be I," began Mr. Brooks; then he stopped abruptly and shut his mouth very firmly, as if he feared he might admit more to his enemy's daughter than would be advisable under the circumstances. "You can come any time you want too, if he'll let ye. I'm workin' in the lot nowadays, pickin' up brush, 'n I'll be glad to hev comp'ny."

Mary Ellen kept thinking about it all the way home. Mr. Brooks seemed such a pleasant man that it seemed a great pity the old difficulty could not be dropped. She wondered if it ever would be.

"I do b'leeve he'd be willin' to be friends again, if pa would," said Mary Ellen, as she told her mother about her conversation with Mr. Brooks. "I 'most know he would!"

"I wouldn't say anything to pa 'bout it," advised Mrs. Leith; "leastwise, nothin' 'bout what was said o' the trouble between 'em. Yer pa wouldn't like that, I'm sure. But you might tell him 'bout Mr. Brooks helpin' ye pick berries 'n' askin' ye over the fence, 'n' see how he took it."

"I will," said Mary Ellen. And when her father came to supper she showed him the blackberries she had brought home, and said:—

"You can't guess who helped me pick 'em, pa."

Mr. Leith guessed several times, and failed to "guess right."

"It was Mr. Brooks," said Mary Ellen. "He picked more'n as many again as I did An' he said I might come over the fence an' pick berries any time I wanted to. May I, pa?"

"I don't want no berries that growed on his land," said Mr. Leith. "I won't be beholden to him fer enything."

Mary Ellen turned away with a sad look of disappointment on her face. Her father saw it, and felt angry with himself for refusing her request. It was foolish to do so, he knew, but he was too proud and stubborn to admit it by giving her permission to do what she had hoped he might.

"You hurt the child's feelin's," said his wife that night, when they were alone. "She went out an' had a good cry over it. I do think, Silas, you're doin' an awful wrong thing in handin' down this ol' difficulty to the children. If you an' Mr. Brooks can't get along peaceable, it ain't no reason why he an the children shouldn't, if he's willin'."

"I don't s'pose 'tis," admitted Mr. Leith. "I'm sorry I didn't tell her she could go if she wanted to. But Brooks 'n I've been out with each other so long that it kind o' seems like knucklin' under to him, some way."

"Sho, now!" declared Mrs. Leith. "It don't seem like anything o' the sort. It's just sayin' yer willin' for him an' Mary Ellen to be frien's, if they want to. There ain't no call to make it appear like knucklin' under, 's I c'n see."

"Mebbe not," said Mr. Leith. He thought the matter over during the night, and in the morning he told Mary Ellen that he "didn't know's he'd any objections to her pickin' berries on Mr. Brooks's land, if she wanted to."

"Oh, I'm so glad," she cried, giving him a hug and kiss in her delight. "I—I wish—" Then she stopped. Perhaps it would hardly be wise to say what she wished just then. It could afford to wait.

The next day she went berrying again. Mr. Brooks was at work in the blackberry lot.

"I'm coming over the fence," she said. "Pa said I could."

"All right—come along," said Mr. Brooks, looking pleased. "But I'll warrant he wasn't very anxious to have ye."

Mary Ellen pretended not to hear that. "She's a sensible little thing," thought Mr. Brooks. "I was a fool to say that to her. She ain't to blame for her father's foolishness."

It wasn't long before Mary Ellen was talking as free with Mr. Brooks as if she had known him for years. He was fond of children, and had the "knack" of getting on with them in such a way as to win their friendship easily. Years ago he had had a little girl and a little boy, but they had died, and no others had ever come to take their place. He told Mary Ellen about this as they sat on a log together, after the basket had been filled with berries, and the little girl saw that tears were in his eyes, as his thoughts went back to the time when his children went away from him, and her heart went out in love and sympathy to the man who missed so much the music and the sunshine of the little lives that had left such sweet, sad memories behind them. She crept up to his side and put her hand in his without knowing that she did it, and when he had finished his story she put her arms about his neck and kissed him.

The days went by and the friendship between Mary Ellen and Mr. Brooks grew very rapidly. She enjoyed her blackberry expeditions more and more as the berries grew scarcer, and because of the fear that when they were gone the friendly intercourse between her and her neighbor would come to an end. Sometimes he brought her great handsful of old-fashioned flowers from his garden—hollyhocks and southernwood and gillyflowers and grass pinks—and these she carried home and kept them fresh for days. Once or twice she saw her father looking at them as if he was pleased with them; but he never asked where they came from. He knew well enough, however, she felt very sure.

"I s'pose Mary Ellen's just carried away with Brooks," he said to his wife one day, after she had been telling him something that the little girl had told her about the conversation in the blackberry lot.

"She likes him," answered Mrs. Leith, discreetly. "An' I'm sure he must ha' took a great notion to her, from what she tells. I guess she don't like him no better'n he likes her."

"I don't see how he could help likin' her," said Mr. Leith. She's a good little girl an' nobody can say to the contrary."

One day Mary Ellen climbed upon her father's neck and kissed him. Then she sat there for a long time without saying anything. All at once she spoke:

"Pa, what's the reason you an' Mr. Brooks ain't frien's?"

"We had trouble, years ago," answered her father.

"What was it about, pa?" she asked.

"It—it—" Mr. Leith thought, when he began to speak, that he could tell his little girl just exactly what the trouble grew out of, but, to his surprise, he couldn't. It had all happened so long ago that he had actually forgotten what the enmity between him and Mr. Brooks sprang from. "I don't jest seem to remember," he said.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE WIDOW SCHMIDT'S COW.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER II.

Such a potato had never before been seen in the kingdom. In the next potato hill they were not so large, but of a excellent size and of the very finest quality. Now, the old lady fairy carried a cane, and it was noticed that every time anything uncommon happened she used this cane. First, she touched the pocketbook with it; then she had touched the potato vine. Now,

He could not pull his hands from the apple.

going to the pear tree, the fairy said, "The great fair is to be held next week, and, in addition to the usual prize for apples, pears and berries, the king has offered a special prize this year for potatoes."

Saying this, she knocked two pears from the tree with the cane and said, "You had better take your potato and these pears to the fair. I will be back in time to go with you."

The town in which the fair was to be held was over twenty miles away, so in order to carry the potato, to say nothing about getting themselves there, it would be necessary to borrow Mr. Stine's horse and wagon.

The whole family went with the old lady and placed their immense potato on the table where the potatoes were shown; also, as by the fairy's direction they had brought the two pears.

These pears had been put in a covered basket. The Schmidts were therefore again surprised to find that the pears were not the small and almost worthless ones which they had placed in the basket when starting, but were now larger and handsomer than any they had ever before seen.

The king's messenger, who was Mr. Scooper's oldest son, in going his rounds, was greatly pleased and surprised to find such a potato and such pears, and immediately wanted to know where they were raised.

The old lady was at hand to tell him, and he was so much interested that he wished to see the tree upon which the pears grew. She offered to tell him all about it and guide him there the next day.

When he arrived at the Schmidt cottage he thought that nothing of any great value could come from such a pear tree or such a potato garden.

The arrival of the king's chariot in the village was something which had never before happened, and the village people all turned out to see the king's messenger and chariot.

Mr. Stine came with his family, and the old lady said to him, "You had better carry some apples to the fair," to which he replied, "My apples are so poor this year that they are hardly worth sending."

The messenger said he would go with Mr. Stine and judge for himself.

Taking her cane the old lady, without being seen by any one, touched two apples and said, "There are some apples which will take the prizes."

Sure enough, there were some apples finer than any he had ever seen. Mr. Stine's surprise was even greater than that of the king's messenger. He quickly climbed the tree, picked the apples and placed them in the chariot to be exhibited for the fair.

Now, although the king's messenger was well paid to get fruit from all parts of the kingdom and exhibit it for those to whom it rightfully belonged, he began to scheme for some means of getting part of the prize which he well knew Mr. Stine's apples would take.

The old lady read his thoughts and resolved to give him a lesson. Accordingly she said, "There is one of the same size on this tree." The messenger did not believe her, but she pointed to one as large and fine as the first two which had been placed in the chariot, and told him he might have it if he could pick it.

Having climbed upon the back of one of the horses, the messenger reached up and grasped the apple, but the horse, unused to having any one stand upon his back, stepped quickly aside and left him hanging to the apple with both hands. Strange as it may seem, while Mr. Stine had picked the apples as readily as one could wish, the messenger could neither pull the apple from the limb nor pull his hands from the apple. There he hung, like a feather to a tarred stick.

He resolved that when he got out of this predicament he would most soundly punish both Mr. Stine and the old lady, but the old lady, knowing that this was his intention, made him promise that he would say nothing about the matter and would give the apple to the first poor person he met.

When this was arranged, the fairy pointed her finger at the apple and our messenger, holding his hands above his head, dropped to the ground.

The apple was then picked by Mr. Stine and put into the chariot. Every one had a jolly laugh at the messenger, who, unable to move his arms for a minute, still stood with his hands above his head. The village doctor enjoyed a good joke, a good fee, or a chance to look wise; so, when the messenger asked him what to do to regain the use of his arms he looked very sober. He felt the messenger's pulse very carefully, while the old lady, unheard by others, gave him advice. Then he said very solemnly, "My fee is five dollars. You are all right now, however."

Having paid a remarkably high fee for a remarkable case, the messenger now felt like a hero and a man of some mark in the world; in fact, he was content.

You see, most people like to be famous in some way, whether it be for good or bad fortune. In Hardluck the person having the

Of Interest to Women.

EDITED BY MISS F. V. DOANE.

"From 3 to 5."

I have said that an afternoon tea need not be an expensive affair, even though a great many people are invited. I will describe the menu of two pleasant afternoons, and you may judge for yourself. At one afternoon tea there were served "aristocrats," a daintily shaped salted wafer, ladies' fingers, almon macaroons, and kisses. The "aristocrats" cost twenty-five cents a pound, and we had a pound. The fingers, macaroons and kisses were made by the baker the morning of the entertainment, and thus were perfectly fresh. They cost one cent each. That makes two dollars and a half. Then we had coffee, cocoa and tea,—one more drink than necessary, by-the-way,—and whipped cream and lemons. But there was not a pint of cream used nor more than three lemons; the drinks could not have cost more than thirty cents, and we had served about one hundred different ladies To tell the whole story, we had two afternoons. There were about seventy-five present the first afternoon, and we had so much left that we sent out invitations to others for another afternoon. Now if it cost three dollars to entertain a hundred people that is very little. I have not counted, of course, the hired help necessary, because we had no extra help. Our young lady friends poured tea and served, and that is usual at "afternoons." I am sure we all enjoyed the occasion. At another afternoon last winter there was served bread and butter sandwiches, cut in small triangles, then sweet wafers, large peppermints, salted almonds and candied ginger, with tea and cocoa.

For summer, of course, especially if the weather is warm, a cold drink or an ice, with or without one hot drink, is more acceptable. Plain lemonade iced, strawberry lemonade, raspberry lemonade, sherbet, frappé, are any one of them refreshing on a warm day. They are simple and inexpensive if made at home, as they may be. If a lady is a good cook she can herself make ladies' fingers, macaroons—almond or cocoanut—delicate jumbles; indeed, the cook books tell us how to make innumerable kinds of dainties that are suitable to serve at an afternoon tea, the materials for which cost very little.

Lawn Party.

People, especially the young, enjoy an out-of-door gathering. It is managed either for afternoon or evening. If invitations are given for afternoon and evening a more substantial repast is necessary than when invitations are given from three to five, or from seven to ten. It is very delightful to have tables laid on a porch, or under the trees, or food may be passed. In either case food that is conveniently handled should be prepared. There are a good many dainty sandwiches, and nothing is more appropriate, either for light refreshment or for a more substantial meal. A lady who has a lawn of any size can give her friends a great deal of enjoyment of an afternoon or evening by serving tea out-of-doors. I cannot do more than make suggestions which any one can carry out.

PALMER NEWS.

MANY LAWNS DESTROYED.

By a Grub Which Eats Off the Roots of the Grass.

In spite of the generous rains of recent date many of the fine lawns throughout the village have turned seer and brown, and the owners have mourned their loss and puzzled their brains for a cause or a remedy. The first is inexplainable, but the latter is not so easy. The damage is done by a white grub about an inch long and nearly as large round as a lead pencil, with a brown head armed with a pair of jaws much resembling those of a pinch bug, only smaller. This has made its appearance in large numbers in the lawns, and eats the roots of the grass off about an inch or an inch and a half below the surface. It is a rapid worker, and covers a large section in a short time. After it has done its work the turf is soft and spongy, and can be easily dug up with the fingers and rolled back. The soil under the turf is pulverized to a depth of a couple of inches, and is full of the grubs, it not being uncommon to find a dozen or more just below the grass in a space six or eight inches in circumference on turning back the turf, while more are in the soil beneath.

The discovery of what was causing the trouble was made Wednesday afternoon on the lawn of Postmaster Royce on Central street. Mr. Royce's family became convinced from the appearance of the grass that it was not due to a lack of moisture, and began an investigation, resulting in the finding of the grubs. Mr. Royce announced his find to others, who investigated with the same result. An example of the numbers of the pest is shown by the gathering of about three quarts of them from a space ten feet square on the lawn of the Universalist church.

What to do to get rid of them is the question which is troubling lawn owners, for that which will kill the grubs is very likely to prove fatal also to the grass. The best remedy suggested thus far is to take off about three inches of infested lawns and start a new turf. The entomologist at the state agricultural college at Amherst has been written to regarding the matter, and may have some suggestion to offer.

All Aboard For Watch Hill.

The second annual excursion of the business men of Palmer comes next Tuesday, the 28th. The excursion is to Watch Hill via the Central Vermont railroad to New London, then by the steamer Block Island to Watch Hill. Excursionists will leave Barrett's Junction at 7.15, Three Rivers at 7 18, and Thorndike at 7.19 on the regular trains. The special train for New London will leave Palmer at 7.45. On the return trip, the steamer will leave Watch Hill at 3 30 and the special train will leave for Palmer immediately after the arrival of the steamer at New London. The fare for the round trip is $1.00, and by paying 25 cents extra the trip can be extended to Block Island and return the same day; by paying 50 cents to the purser of the boat on the down trip the stay at the island may be extended until not later than July 31st. The opening of the new harbor at Block Island shortens the route of the steamer considerably, thus affording a stay of two hours at the island. This trip furnishes a pleasant sail down New London harbor, one of the finest harbors in the country. On the right going down are Forts Trumbull and Griswold, and on the left is Groton Heights and the monument erected where Arnold attacked and burned the city during the Revolution. Every one knows that Watch Hill has a pleasant beach, and the four and one-half hours' stay there furnishes ample time for a good dinner, a dip in the briny ocean, and sufficient time to spend on shore. All the stores in the town with one exception have agreed to close, and all who wish a good time should attend. A train will leave for Thorndike after the arrival of the excursion train at Palmer in the evening.

Three Young Ladies Have an Exciting Experience.

What would have been a shocking accident was prevented by the timely appearance and presence of mind of three young ladies last Friday afternoon. About five o'clock they started for the "Glen" to gather ferns. When crossing the Boston and Albany railroad bridge they saw a man who had fallen and was tightly wedged in between the sleepers. They tried to pull him out from his dangerous position, but their efforts were in vain. It was nearly time for the 5 20 express. Something had to be done promptly. By the waving of handkerchiefs the attention of some men who were working in a hay field near by was attracted, and they hurried to the bridge. With the united efforts of the men and the young ladies the man was removed from his dangerous plight and placed beside the track. The man was unknown to any of the parties present and was unable to tell how he came in such a perilous position. At first it was thought that he was slightly intoxicated, and it was afterwards found out that he was a Monson man. He is subject to fits, and, having been attacked with one shortly before his accident, had taken a little liquor. This is the reason why he was supposed to have been intoxicated. It is probable that he stumbled and fell between the sleepers, and in struggling to release himself was wedged tightly in.

"Deck" Lombard in Trouble Again.

Dexter Lombard, who has an unenviable reputation for obstreperousness, is once more within the toils of the law. High-handed justice has again brought him to account before her bar. Lombard's inability to control his pugilistic aspirations was this time the cause of his trouble. Lombard hired the Rodney Davis farm in South Belchertown for a year. For some reason or other the owner, Manooz H. Jejciay, an Armenian, wished to have Lombard leave before his time was out. He claims that he has received no rent from his tenant, while Lombard claims that he has offered to pay the rent but Jejciay would not take it. A writ of ejectment was served upon Lombard. Sunday afternoon a rather heated discussion about the matter took place, and Lombard's temper, which in such cases is usually calm and amiable, (nit) got the better of him, and he attacked Jejciay with a hoe and threatened his life. Lombard probably thought that the Turkish Empire would come to his aid in this "Armenian Outrage," but instead an officer came from Belchertown and brought him before the seat of justice at Northampton. His case came up Wednesday, and was continued until July 31st.

Palmer Clerks on Top Again.

Again was the honor of the Palmer business men upheld, again were the clerks of Stafford trampled in the dust by their brethren from Palmer. The Staffords, wishing to avenge their defeat at Monson a week ago Thursday, had the Palmers come to Stafford yesterday. The game was played on the agricultural grounds, while strong winds blew across the field, making it hard for the players. For six innings the game was interesting, but in the seventh the Palmers hit the ball hard and batted around once, scoring 8 runs. As usual, when Sugrue is in the box, his fielders had little to do. The Staffords fell before his lightning speed and curves like the city of St. Louis before the terrible cyclone. He struck out 15 men and allowed his opponents but 5 safe hits. He was ably supported behind the bat by Dewey. The score by innings:

Innings,	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Palmers,	1	5	1	0	0	5	8	0	0	—20
Staffords,	0	1	0	2	0	2	0	0	1	— 6

Home runs, Pinney, Sugrue. Three base-hit, Shaw. Struck out, by Sugrue 15, by English 2. Batteries, Sugrue and Dewey, English and McCarty. Umpires, D. McCarty and W. E. Tuthill. Time, 2.40.

The wire mill will soon shut down for a week, to give the men a short vacation. During the shut-down Mr. Lawson and Mr. Normand are to take a Western trip.

The vicinity of the old Babcock tavern on the road to Enfield renewed the scenes of its youth again last Sunday with a clambake given by Ware parties, which was attended by a number of Palmer men.

Woolrich & Company have a new wagon with the words "Ridges Food for Infants and Invalids" painted upon the sides. The company will put the wagon upon the road, and will use it for advertising purposes.

While putting hay into the barn on the farm of W. E. Breckenridge last Friday with a new hay-fork, William Mason caught his right hand in a pulley, cutting off the top of the middle finger and also splitting the third finger to the first joint. The injury causes him much pain.

The Y. P. C. U. of St. Paul's church voted last Sunday evening to continue their services during August, as several of the church people will return from their vacations by the first of the month. The services will be of a somewhat general character, adapted for both old and young. A committee consisting of E. C. Gould and Rev. H. F. Moulton was appointed to arrange for subjects, leaders and music.

Sig. Sawtelle's "big one-ring circus, museum and trained animals" is announced to give afternoon and evening performances on the Thorndike street circus lot Saturday, Aug. 1st. This is announced as the "largest one-ring amusement enterprise on the road, and one of a very few shows which presents everything exactly as advertised." One of the attractions is said to be a "singing and talking lady clown."

The selectmen have made application to the proper authorities for the loan of road machinery, as authorized by the last Legislature, and have received a reply that the attorney general has been asked to give a decision regarding the constitutionality of the act, so that there is little likelihood of getting the apparatus for some time, if at all. The work of grading Thorndike street preparatory to macadamizing, will begin next week.

The rear axle on the hook and ladder truck, which was broken in going to the fire a week ago last Saturday, has been repaired, and the truck is now ready for use. The officers of the department think that the break was caused by the weight of the persons who had jumped on to obtain a ride to the fire, and have issued an order forbidding anyone but firemen to ride on the apparatus, and only a limited number of them will be permitted to do so.

Rev. H. F. Moulton will preach next Sunday morning on the theme: "Are you weary in your work? Come and get rest from your weariness." This will be the last preaching service until September, as the church will be closed as usual during August. Mr. Moulton will spend part of his vacation in Boston and in Portland, Me. He will not leave at present, however, because of sickness in his family, and a wedding soon to take place in one of our Palmer homes at which he is to officiate.

Work on the repairs to the steeple of the Universalist church has been at a standstill during the week. The staging was erected as high as the roof of the main building, when the workmen declined to go further, saying that they did not wish to ascend to the altitude necessary to put the staging to the top of the steeple. G. W. Lyman, who had the contract, was unable to get men to do the work, so gave up the job. F. F. Marcy has taken the matter in hand and will proceed with the work next Monday.

Monday was circus day, when Scribner & Smith's show visited the town, and the streets presented a somewhat livelier appearance than commonly. At noon many turned out to see the parade. There were two exhibitions given, afternoon and evening. A fairly good sized crowd was present in the afternoon, but in the evening a very large crowd attended, and had it not rained many more would have been present. Both exhibitions were good, the ring performances calling forth generous applause from the spectators. The company left for Ware Monday night, where they exhibited Tuesday afternoon and evening.

District Court.

Almonso Jarvis, Phillip Jarvis, Hernest Barber and Ernest Consigny, the boys accused of breaking into the store of Charles Spicer in Three Rivers, appeared before the court Saturday. Consigny pleaded guilty and the others entered a plea of nolo. All were put on probation until Aug.15. State Agent Southmayd furnished the necessary securities.

On discovering that it was gone she retraced her steps at once, hoping to find it, but it was no avail. She gave up all hopes of ever seeing it again, but Daniel Manning, coming from Thorndike, found the watch and returned it to Miss Lane as soon as he found she was the owner.

It will be remembered that last winter R. C. Newell, superintendent of the Palmer Mill, gave all the boys and girls under 16 years of age who worked in the mill a sleighride and supper. Last Saturday the same children gave Mr. Newell a surprise party at his home. Ice cream and cake were served on the grounds near Mr. Newell's house, and it was a very happy company which attended.

Miss Jennie Harren, who went to the hospital in New York some nine weeks ago for treatment of a tumor in the stomach, died at that place on Monday. The remains were brought here Tuesday afternoon, and the funeral was at the house Wednesday at 2 p. m. Mr. and Mrs. Harren received word from their daughter last Saturday saying that she was getting along so well that she would start home yesterday and when they received the news Tuesday that she was dead it was a great shock to them, especially to Mrs. Harren, who is now very sick. Mr. and Mrs. Harren have the sympathy of the community in the loss of their daughter.

Three Rivers 22—North Wilbrahams 15.

The North Wilbraham team was defeated last Saturday on the home grounds by the Three Rivers club, the score being 22 to 15. The game was loosely played by the visitors who, had they supported their battery better, would have made a different score. Lane's home run started the scoring for the home team, and his playing was good at critical times. Grise's running catch was the feature of the game; J. Connor also played a good game. The best playing for the visitors was done by their battery and first baseman. The score:

Runaway Accident.

Mr. Bowler of Braintree, who was visiting friends here on Saturday afternoon, hitched his horse to a post and left his two children in the carriage. The horse became frightened at some flying paper in the street and broke loose, running into a clothes post and throwing the children out of the carriage. The boy, Charles, 7 years old, was cut in the head by striking on a stone, but the injuries were slight.

Two Accidents.

Timothy Daily met with an accident here on Saturday afternoon while at work removing the old school building. He was sitting on the windlass taking in the slack rope, when the bar to which a horse was attached broke, striking him just above the temple with great force and inflicting a wound from which blood flowed freely. Had the blow been a little lower the result might have been serious. Andrew Brosnahan had his hand caught beneath some timbers and his fingers badly squeezed.

Thorndikes 10—Indian Orchards 7.

Thorndike defeated Indian Orchard in a closely played game last Saturday on the home grounds. Everyone supposed that Indian Orchard would be easy, but they surprised themselves and their most ardent supporters by putting up a strong game. As it was, they were ahead in the first of the ninth when Burdett lost his own game by giving two men their base on balls and was touched up for two singles and a sacrifice. Sugrue, as usual, pitched a ball that was hard to find, striking out 12 men and allowing them but seven safe hits. Riley made the star play of the game in the third inning. Two men were on bases and Burdett hit a line ball to right. It was good for two bases, but Riley came in on the run and scooped it in with one hand just off the ground. Kennedy, Kelliher, King and Meeker hit the ball hard.

Bordeau opened the game for Thorndike by striking out; Kennedy hit safe, and Kelliher and Sullivan followed his example; Sugrue was given his base on balls, forcing in Kennedy; Chapman went out on a short fly to King; Fleming made a hit, scoring Kelliher and Sullivan; Riley hit to Ahearn, who fumbled the ball while Sugrue and Fleming scored; Hurley ended the inning by striking out. For Indian Orchard, Cavin struck out; Carnes flew out to Bordeau; King hit for two bases and Meeker did the same, scoring King; Burdett reached first on an error, Ahearn hit a ground ball to Kennedy who missed it, and Meeker and Burdett scored; Duplisses struck out. Score, Thorndike 5, Indian Orchard 3. In the second inning, Bordeau went out, McBride to Ahearn; Kennedy went out to Ahearn, Kelliher struck out. McBride went out, Kennedy to Kelliher; McCarthy went out to Kennedy; Cavin struck out. In the third, fourth and fifth innings neither side scored. In the sixth, King hit safely and was advanced to second by Meeker's hit, scoring on Ahearn's sacrifice. Thorndike was retired without a run. In the seventh, Bordeau hit for two bases but was declared out for not touching first; Kennedy hit safe; Kelliher put the ball into the woods for two bases, scoring Kennedy, but was later caught napping off third; Sullivan hit safe, and Sugrue went out on a fly to McCarthy. Score, Thorndike 6, Indian Orchard 4. In the eighth Indian Orchard took the lead. King hit safe and Meeker reached first on Kelliher's error; Burdett flew out to Hurley; McBride hit safe, scoring King and Meeker; Duplisses and McCarthy struck out. Thorndike failed to score. In the ninth the rooters commenced to yell, and this so affected Burdett that he gave Hurley and Bordeau their base on balls; Kennedy hit safe; Kelliher sacrificed, scoring Hurley and Bordeau; Sullivan went out, Burdett to Ahearn; Sugrue hit safe, bringing in Kennedy; Chapman hit to Carnes, who failed to stop the ball and Kelliher scored; Fleming went out, Carnes to Ahearn. For Indian Orchard, Cavin went out, Bordeau to Kelliher; Carnes struck out, and King went out, Kennedy to Kelliher. The score:

THE approaching readjustment of the county into representative districts, and the suggestion in last week's JOURNAL as to the possible disposition of the towns in Eastern Hampden, has set the voters thinking a little of the matter, and there seems to be a wide difference of opinion, especially in the present ninth district—Monson, Wales, Wilbraham, Longmeadow and East Longmeadow. Monson and Wales would like a district composed of the same towns with the addition of Brimfield and Holland, which would lack about 200 voters of the average number required for a district. This would necessitate hitching two wards of Chicopee onto Palmer and Ludlow, as the one ward of Springfield available contains more than the required number of voters. Such a move would leave Chicopee, whose wards are small, in an undesirable situation, and is not likely to be done. In view of the geographical location of the towns it is more than likely that one district will be made up of Palmer, Monson, Brimfield, Wales and Holland. To Ludlow, Wilbraham and Hampden might be added ward eight of Springfield,—Indian Orchard,—putting East Longmeadow and Longmeadow in with other small towns west of the river.

TROUBLE is breeding for the highway appropriation bill in the next Legislature. The bill in the last Legislature which gave the commission its present appropriation was not without its opponents, and unless all signs fail the number will be materially augmented another year. There are many places throughout the state which were promised last year that they should have a section of road built within their borders this year, but with few exceptions the road has failed to materialize, and attempts to get definite information from the commission have met with indefinite statements or a refusal to give a section of road. When the bill was liable to be killed in the last Legislature the commission was ready to promise almost anything to get it through, but is now decidedly indifferent regarding the keeping of its pledges. So, altogether, it will not be in the least surprising if an increased number of members of the 1897 Great and General Court have a knife up their sleeve for the state highway commission.

AMERICA does not always afford a peaceful haven of refuge for subjects of foreign countries when their sovereign is particularly anxious to a hold on them. A young Russian Jew of Boston who has for some years supported himself by blacking boots about the police headquarters, has been notified that unless he returns to Russia and performs military duty his father will have to pay a fine of between $300 and $400; failing to do this his goods will be confiscated and he will be imprisoned. The young fellow is only about 19.

A PECULIAR course of reasoning must have been that of the labor strikers at Cleveland, O., the other day, when they announced that one of their number had been "deliberately murdered" by a non-union workman. The non-union man was on his way home from work on his wheel when he was attacked by a mob of strikers and stoned, finally being knocked from his wheel half stunned, whereupon he fired a revolver at the mob which was advancing with cries of "Kill the scab." The only pity is that more of his assailants were not "deliberately murdered."

CORRESPONDENCE between the United States and Great Britain regarding the Venezuelan boundary matter, which was made public last Friday night, makes it certain that there will be no serious trouble between the two countries, as it appeared at one time there might be. A general treaty of arbitration is being negotiated for, and may be expected before long. Great Britain recognizes our right to interfere in the Venezuelan case, however, and the announcement is made that when the facts regarding the controversy have been fully ascertained "by a commission in which both countries has confidence," the diplomatic relations which would follow would not be difficult to adjust. While this does not say that the report of our Venezuelan commission will be accepted by Great Britain, it probably means it, and an early settlement of the matter is not unlikely.

THE announcement that Thomas B. Reed of Maine will stand again for the congressional nomination will carry joy to his many friends in all parts of the country, who will rejoice that he has altered his decision not to return. There will be not the slightest doubt of his election.

NEIGHBORHOOD NOTES.

MONSON.

New Teachers for the Academy.

The vacancies in the Academy faculty have been filled the past week. There were 118 applicants for the position. Mr. Corbett, who temporarily succeeded the late Prof. Morse, will be succeeded by Barker Newhall, Ph. D., of Lynn. Dr. Newhall was graduated from Haverford College, Pa., in 1887. The following three years were spent at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, in special study of Latin and Greek, for which he received the degree of Ph. D. This was followed by a year of study in Germany, Italy, and Greece. For two years he was instructor of the classics in a Friend's school, Baltimore, and for three years he was Greek instructor at Brown University. During the past year he assisted in editing two Platonic dialogues and a work on Mycenaean Archaeology. No teacher has ever come to the Academy with a like equipment. Miss Strong will be succeeded by Miss Lena M. Adams of Wethersfield, Ct. She is a graduate of Wesleyan University and has taken a year of post-graduate work in mathematics and physics, for which she received the degree of M. A. She has had one year's experience in the Middletown, Ct., high school. An effort is being made to still further improve the quality of work in all departments of the school, and with this end in view specialists in their respective departments have been secured. Some of the alumni have expressed a willingness to assist financially in the movement. With the new year a few changes will be introduced in the course of study, which will make it the equal of any in New England. Literature will be confined to one year, zoology will be dropped, the course in chemistry will be lengthened to a year, and the Harvard requirement in physics will be added to all the courses. Miss Pease will be teacher of English and will have classes in literature, junior English, English history, ethics, psychology and German. Miss Hibbard will teach history and assist Dr. Newhall in the classics. Miss Adams will teach all the classes in mathematics, and Mr. Burke will be confined to the sciences. Dr. Newhall and Miss Adams will reside at Hammond Hall, and the former will have charge there. Mr. Burke will soon leave town for his vacation.

The day was all that could be desired for baseball, and there were many spectators, especially young ladies. The coaching of Cantwell for Monson and that of Sullivan for Stafford was good. The matter of redistricting causes quite an interest among polititions and others. The feeling here is that the same towns which have composed the ninth district be continued together, taking in Brimfield and Holland, which would make a very pleasant district, as all the towns are harmonious and have become attached to each other and desire no division.

His 80th Birthday Celebrated.

The 80th birthday of Cheney Newton was very happily celebrated at his home in Brimfield last Saturday. Mr. Newton had been looking forward to a family gathering on this anniversary, and he was gratified by having present over 20, children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, to sit down to his birthday dinner. Among the guests present were John Newton of Spencer, Mrs. Seraph N. Hines of Brimfield, Mr. and Mrs. John Lawrence, Miss Nellie Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Lawrence and two children of Warren, Miss Alice Bemis of Spencer, and David Henshaw of West Brookfield.

Unknown to Mr. Newton, a double celebration had been planned, and he was completely surprised in the evening to receive a visit from a large delegation of the J. Arthur Johnson Grand Army post, and the auxiliary relief corps. His comrades of the post, of which Mr. Newton is a devoted member, brought with them a purse of gold and silver coins. The presentation was made in a very felicitous speech by ex-Commander Alvin Chamberlain of Sturbridge. Among other things, Mr. Chamberlain said that as the members of the post were ignorant of their comrade's views on the money question now agitating the country, it seemed desirable to bring him both gold and silver in token of their affection and esteem. Though utterly unprepared for anything of the kind, their venerable comrade was able to make a graceful response in acknowledgement of the gift and the tribute which had been paid him. T. D. Lincoln, captain of Co. G of the 46th regiment, to which Mr. Newton belonged, recalled some interesting incidents connected with Mr. Newton's war service. Recitations were given by Cheney F. and Julia Newton, and a violin solo by Charlie Pierce. The company sang patriotic hymns and war songs, and Mrs. Kyle sang an appropriate selection. A poem was composed for the occasion by a granddaughter, Mrs. Carrie Smith of Spencer, who was unable to be present. Refreshments were served by the women of the relief corps. Those present from out of town were Mr. and Mrs. Levi Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Alvin Chamberlain, Mr. and Mrs. Julius Lyon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Corey, Rev. Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Edgerton, Augustus Snell, Mr. and Mrs. William Hinman and Mrs. Underwood of Sturbridge, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Roper and Baxter Bennett of Holland.

Although Mr. Newton is not a native of Brimfield, he has been a highly esteemed citizen of the town for over half a century. He has held various town offices, including those of selectman, assessor, overseer of the poor, tax collector, and constable. He has always been counted among the leading Democrats in Brimfield, while on the temperance question he is a prohibitionist. Mr. Newton was born in Brookfield, and was married to Miss Jane Rice of that town Oct. 25, 1836. They moved to Brimfield in 1840. A pleasantly remembered event was the celebration of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Newton by their townspeople in the town hall. Mrs. Newton died three years ago, and of their seven children only three survive, John Newton of Spencer, Mrs. Hines of Brimfield, and Mrs. John Lawrence of Warren. The death of Frank R. Newton last year was a terrible blow to his aged father, and also a great loss to the town which he had faithfully served in office. But for the past few months Mr. Newton's health has greatly improved, and he takes his wonted interest in people and affairs; while his declining years are cheered by the devotion of his daughter-in-law and grandchildren, with whom he makes his home.

Lawton post, G. A. R. Eden lodge of Masons, and the Odd Fellows. He leaves a wife. The funeral was held this afternoon at the Uditarian church, and was in charge of the G. A. R. post; the local Masons attended in a body. He was a man who will be greatly missed by all.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Mr. G. Cailloutte, druggist, Beaversville, Ill., says: "To Dr. King's New Discovery I owe my life. Was taken with la grippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail, and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. Won't keep store or house without it." Get a free trial of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Mrs. Rhodie Noah, of this place, was taken in the night with cramping pains and the next day diarrhoea set in. She took half a bottle of blackberry cordial but got no relief. She then sent to me to see if I had anything that would help her. sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and the first dose relieved her. Another of our neighbors had been sick for about a week and had tried different remedies for diarrhoea but kept getting worse. I sent him this same remedy. Only four doses of it were required to cure him. He says he owes his recovery to this wonderful remedy.—Mrs. Mary Sibley, Sidney, Mich. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

Food, undigested, is poison. Digested, it is life and strength. Millions of us suffer from indigestion, but we often don't know it. We think it is something else. Even doctors often mistake the symptoms.

Pale, thin people, who are overworked, who need strength, who seem in want of proper food, should take Shaker Digestive Cordial. It is astonishing what food will do, when properly digested.

It will make you strong, revive you, refresh you, sustain you, make you fat, restore your color, make muscle, brain fibre, courage, endurance, energy; increase your power to throw off disease and keep you healthy and happy.

Indigestion does just the opposite, but indigestion can be cured and prevented with Shaker Digestive Cordial.

Sold by druggists. Trial bottle 10 cents.

Last summer one of our grandchildren was sick with a severe bowel trouble. This certainly is the best medicine ever put on the market for dysentery, summer complaint, colic and cholera infantum in children. It never fails to give prompt relief when used in reasonable time and the plain printed directions are followed. Many mothers have expressed their sincere gratitude for the cures it has effected. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

sorest thumb or the worst attack of fever ever known was as much of a hero for the hour as if he had done some deed of especial merit and daring.

The old lady and the messenger drove back to the fair. On the road they met a poor old cripple, whom they invited to ride with them in a chariot and to whom they gave the apple which had the grip.

Carl and Louise, with their mother, had in the meantime been enjoying themselves immensely, and were very glad, indeed, to see their friend, the old lady, return with the king's messenger.

The three apples were put in their places and of course received prizes. When the fair was over, the children, with their mother, returned home, and the old lady very politely bade them good-by.

Mr. Stine's kindness to all his neighbors, and especially to the Schmidt family, had earned for him the affection of everyone in the village, and when it was known that he had taken two prizes for apples and Mrs. Schmidt two for pears and one for potatoes, there was such a celebration in the village of Hardluck as had never been known, and when Mrs. Schmidt, besides buying a span of horses, two plows, a wagon and three sheep, had a new barn built it seemed to these poor villagers that so much wealth could hardly be contained in one village. But when, the next spring, it was arranged that the neighbors could have the use of the horses and plows for their gardens at a cost much smaller than before had been possible, it seemed that prosperity was almost boundless.

From year to year the people increased their gardens and grew more and more prosperous, until the village committee called a special meeting and it was voted to change the name of the village from Hardluck to Goodluck.

The king himself became interested, and having visited the place one autumn, arranged that Carl Schmidt, who was now a lad of about 17, should become his royal gardener. As for Louise, her clear, sweet voice so attracted the king when she sang in the church choir that he resolved she should have the best music teacher in the kingdom, as well as every opportunity to become a great musician.

Mrs. Schmidt went to live with her children in the gardener's house on the palace grounds, and on account of her sunny temper and extreme politeness and constant willingness to oblige, she was made chief lady in waiting to the queen.

THE END.

A JUST REBUKE.

Surfeited with wonders, the young couple from the country had succumbed to fatigue and were seated on a bale of hay in an obscure corner of the menagerie tent. The band played in the distance and the voices of the sideshow lecturers were only a confused buzz when they penetrated this quiet nook. The man who was carrying water to the elephants paused to look at them, but they were oblivious to his presence.

"Well," she said, "I dunno as I want to see no more sights for a long time."

"That's jist how I feel," he replied, "I'd be satisfied now ter settle down an' live quiet the rest o' my life."

"What do you reckon is the most astonishin' thing we've seed?"

"It's hard ter make a ch'ice. But I know which one I'd ruther be this minute."

"I reckon ye'd like ter be the flyin' trapeze man," she ventured.

"No, sirree."

"Mebbee the ringmaster."

"Nope."

"Which would ye rather be?"

"Do you remember the animal in the glass tank they called an octopus?"

"Course."

"He had nigh onto a hundred arms."

"I guess he had; though I didn't stop to count 'em."

"I'd like ter be him."

"What fur?"

"So's I could use all them arms in huggin' you a hundred times all ter oncet."

"Josiar," she said gravely, "that's a very wrong wish."

"'Taint neither."

"Yes, 'tis. It's sinful ter waste time wishin' fur the impossible, 'stead o' makin' the best o' sech opportunities ez ye happen ter have."

The man who was carrying water to the elephants turned hastily away and proceeded with his duties. There are moments which defy intrusion.—Detroit Free Press.

THE FALLS WERE SECURED.

The clerk at the middle desk was soon to be married, so the red-headed clerk to his left and the bald-headed clerk to his right were doing all in their power to make his life unbearable.

"Are they going to take a wedding journey?" asked the bald-headed clerk.

"Not this time," said the red-haired one.

"Why not?"

"No funds. He spent it all on candy and theater tickets."

The clerk in the middle shifted uneasily on the stool.

"That was foolish," said the bald-headed clerk.

"Oh, I don't know. He might not have got her otherwise."

"What's the use of having her if he can't carry her around and show her off?"

"He'll have the fun of knowing she's there."

"And they're not even going to the falls?"

"Not even to the falls."

The clerk in the middle raised his head.

"I've bought a couple of bicycles," he said quietly, "and we rather expect the falls to come to us."—Chicago Tribune.

A MARKET MAN'S LUCK.

SAVED AT THE VERY BRINK OF THE GRAVE.

Made Over New from the Soles of His Feet to the Top of His Head, by Prof. Dixi Crosby's Prize Formula.

"I was sick for nearly two years," said George H. Dunning, of Faneuil Hall Market, the historic landmark of Boston. "I was run down, had nervous prostration, lost my appetite, could not sleep without opiates, had little control over my limbs, was so light-headed that I was afraid to walk about alone, could not see except through a blur, had a constant pain in the pit of my stomach, and had abandoned business, pleasure, and, practically, life itself. When the crisis came I was out of my head and my temperature was up to 105 degrees. When the neighbors came to inquire the doctor told them that I was past hope. My nurse made another appointment, as if it was certain that my death would come in five days at the outside.

"I had one chance in a hundred, and I took that chance. All the doctors and medicines had failed in my case, and I threw them all over. It seems as if there are new kinds of diseases in these days of steam and electricity, and new treatments are needed.

"Puritana was just what I needed. When I got a bottle and began using it I found that I was being made over new, just as it says, from the soles of my feet to the top of my head.

"It stopped that miserable pain at the pit of my stomach; it made me eat like a hungry man and sleep like a healthy, tired man. It cleared my head so that I can now see without glasses and walk home through the crowded streets without the least danger of falling down under the horses' feet.

"It seems good to get back to the market again, and it makes me want to hug the man who discovered Puritana when I realize that I can well, even better than I was before I was taken sick. My wife says that it is preposterous to say that anything but Puritana saved my life, for it also saved me from the danger of paralysis. At that time my friends would not have given two cents for my chances. That is why I do not lose a chance to tell about Puritana; for I believe a great many lives could be saved if people only knew what it would do.

"I will never be without Puritana as long as I live, and I believe that will be some time, as I am growing younger and happier every day."

It cures from head to foot.

Revised Commandments.

These are the new commandments ten,
Which wives now make for married men:

1—Remember that I am thy wife,
Whom thou must cherish all thy life.

2—Thou shalt not stay out late at night,
When lodges, friends or clubs invite.

3—Thou shalt not smoke indoor or out,
Or chew tobacco round about.

4—Thou shalt with praise receive my pies,
No pastry made by me despise.

5—My mother thou shalt strive to please,
And let her live with us in ease.

6—Remember 'tis thy duty clear
To dress me well throughout the year.

7—Thou shalt, in manner mild and meek,
Give me thy wages every week.

8—Thou shalt not be a drinking man,
But live on prohibition plan.

9—Thou shalt not flirt, but must allow
Thy wife such freedom anyhow.

10—Thou shalt get up when baby cries,
And try the child to tranquilize.

These my commands from day to day
Implicitly thou shalt obey,

MARY ELLEN'S BLACKBERRYING.

"Then it couldn't have been anything very bad," said Mary Ellen. "If it had been, you wouldn't have forgotten it, would you, pa?"

"He didn't use me right," said Mr. Leith. "I know that."

"But mebbe he's sorry now," said Mary Ellen.

"He hain't ever said he was—to me, enyway," said her father.

"He hasn't to me," said Mary Ellen, "'cause we hain't talked about it, but I 'most know he is. I wish—I do wish, pa, you 'n' he would get to be frien's again."

"He did wrong, 'n' he knew it," said Mr. Leith. "When he sees fit to say so, I'm willing to overlook things. But I don't feel on to have ennything to say to him 'bout it. It's his place to speak first."

Mary Ellen made up her mind that the next time she saw Mr. Brooks she would ask him what the trouble was about. She intended to go up to the blackberry lot the next day. But the next day came and she did not go, for she was sick.

Mrs. Leith "doctored" the little girl with boneset and chamomile tea, and bathed her feverish aching head with strong "camfire," but she grew worse steadily, and by and by they grew frightened about her, and sent for the doctor.

"She's a pretty sick child," he said. "She's got a fever; I'm afraid she won't pull through it, but we'll do the best we can for her."

Before night it was known all over the neighborhood that Mary Ellen was very sick and the chances were against her getting well.

The next morning when her father went out to get a breath of fresh air after a sleepless night at the bedside of his little girl, he found a bunch of grass-pinks and southernwood lying on the doorstep. He knew well enough who had left it there. It touched him as no words could.

He carried the flowers in and put them in a glass of water, and set them where Mary Ellen could see them when she woke up from her troubled, restless sleep.

"Has he been here?" she whispered as soon as she caught sight of the "posies."

"I guess he brought 'em, las' night," her father answered. "I found them on the steps."

"Ain't they pretty?" she said. "An' they're so sweet. I want a pink to hold, papa."

Her father gave her one of the flowers, and she held it up close to her face, and seemed to be talking to it. Pretty soon she fell in a doze, from which she awoke a little later, talking about Mr. Brooks. She wanted to see him. She kept calling for him. Her father listened and said nothing.

"I declare, it does seem too bad," said Mrs. Leith at last, and then she broke down and began to cry.

By and by the doctor came. He looked very grave when he saw his little patient.

"There'll be a crisis soon," he said. "I hope she'll take a turn for the better, when it comes, but—I'm afraid! She seems to be worrying herself about something that ought not to be."

Mr. Leith got up and put on his hat.

"I'm going to be gone a little while, Hannah," he said to his wife, and then he went out. She watched him, and saw that he went up the path that led to the blackberry lot.

"I never thought I'd be goin' to hunt up Brooks an' ask him to come to my house," he said to himself, as he climbed the hill. "But that's what I'm a-doin' now. I hate to do it, but I'd do anything for her sake. Oh, God, don't take my little girl! I can't let her go!" and then the world faded out of the strong man's sight for a moment in a mist of tears.

When he reached the hill-summit, he heard the sound of an ax over in Brooks's wood-lot. Presently he came in sight of his old enemy, and for a moment it seemed as if he could not speak to him. Then—"It's for Mary Ellen's sake," he thought, and he went to the fence and called out:

"Hello!"

Mr. Brooks looked that way.

"She—she ain't dead, is she?" he cried, springing toward the fence.

"No, but I'm afraid she's goin' to die!" cried Mr. Leith. "She keeps a callin' for you. Will you come?"

The great tears were rolling down his face. His hand was reached out across the fence.

"I'll come, of course I'll come," said Mr. Brooks; and then he caught the hand of his old enemy in his and wrung it, while his own face was wet with tears. "Dear little thing! You don't know how much good she's done me sence she's got to comin' up here a-berryin'. Seems 'most as if my own little girl had come back to me."

He was over the fence now, and the two men were hurrying down the hill together. When they reached the pasture bars, Mr. Leith paused, and turned to face his companion.

"Forgive me," he said brokenly. "I've allus claimed you was the one to blame. Somehow, things look diff'rent to me now, an' I guess I was the one. I'm sorry. For her sake, le's be frien's."

"I was jest as much to blame as you was," said Mr. Brooks. "I've been sorry, but I was too obst'nit to say so. We'll drop ev'rything, 'n try to do better. Dear little girl—wouldn't she be glad if she knew!"

Mrs. Leith, looking out of the window, saw the two men who had not spoken to each other for so many years coming up the path from the gate together, and she sobbed out "Bless the Lord!" and cried softly behind her apron.

It was afternoon before Mary Ellen came out of her delirium. At first she hardly seemed to recognize any one. Her mind seemed to be in a fog. But by and by the mist cleared away and she looked about her.

"Mr. Brooks is here, dearie," said her mother. "Your pa brought him to see you. Ain't you glad?"

"Oh, I'm so glad!" cried Mary Ellen, and she tried to rise up in bed. "I'm so glad!"

Then Mr. Brooks came and sat down by the bed and took her hands in his, and talked softly to her, and she grew quiet.

"It seemed just as ef his talkin' to her did her more good than med'cin," Mrs. Leith said afterward. "She just ca'med right down, 'n' when the doctor came he sed she was better; 'n' he sed, too, that goin' after Mr. Brooks was the best thing that could ha' b'en done. Ef he hadn't come, he didn't know but she'd 'a' worried herself to de'th, the sickness bein' right at the cyrsis, so."

BattleAx PLUG

The best reason in the world why some things sell so well is because they are good. That is one reason for the great sales of "BATTLE AX."

But good quality is only half the story. The other half is the size of a 5 cent piece. It is as big almost as a 10 cent piece of other and poorer kinds.

Facts are facts. You can buy and see for yourself. Five cents isn't much to invest.

"Gone Home to Dad."

THE SCRAPPER'S LAMENT.

'Tis not always the one who talks loudly and long,
Who can prove himself "good as the best."
Though boastful and vain, yet he often will make
A failure, when brought to the test.
I'll tell you the story of one man I knew,
Whose fate was decidedly sad;
He was one of "us boys," full of bluster and blow,
But he had to "go home to his dad."

He bragged of his science, his skill and his strength,
He could "lick any man whom he knew;"
His father averred it was all very well,
If his stories had only been true.
"I've boarded the b'ye an' I've bought all his clothes"
Since he was a bit of a lad;
He'll get licked some day, with his braggin' so much,—
Then he musn't "come home to his dad."

Our young man was happy, and fearing no harm
He felt independent and gay
Till he met a young chap who would not take his sauce,
And in a most wonderful way
He was battered and beaten and laid in the dirt,
To pursue his reflections most sad;
And he thought as he plowed his nose into the turf,
"Oh, I wish I was home with my dad."

Now his eyes are in mourning, dejected and deep,
His nose is "all over his face;"
He is bitten and bruised, and his fingers, alas!
They are terribly knocked out of place.
But amid all his trouble, and pain, and defeat,
The thought that is driving him mad
Is that he, the self-confident bruiser and tough,
Has had to "go home to his dad."

Take warning, ye boys who aspire to great fame
As scrappers, and champions bold;
Don't be boastful, and vain, and be sure that hard knocks
Will be dealt out more freely than gold.
For bluster and brag, though they make a great noise,
Only make his condition more sad
When a fellow's been beaten clean out of his boots
And has had to "go home to his dad."

A SALVATION ARMY SKETCH.

It was evident that something of uncommon interest had been arranged for the meeting that evening at the headquarters of the Salvation Army in San Francisco. Throughout the large attending crowd the spirit of expectancy moved uneasily, but with muffled wing, its energy stirred, not only by divers vagrant rumors on the street, but also by many flowers and foliage plants which hampered the stage.

After some preliminary religious exercises conducted by the Brigadier, a man with a clean face, a clear eye and a coaxing voice, that gentleman made the following speech:—

"You doubtless all read at the time of its publication a telegram from Butte, Mont., announcing the distressing experience of our brave little sister, Cadet Annie Smith, who was so great a favorite with us here before she was assigned to duty at Butte."

There was an amused twinkle in the Brigadier's eyes, but in the audience there was a spreading titter.

"Well," resumed the Brigadier, "our noble little sister, with the help of God, passed safely through the ordeal, as most of you are aware, but as it is a part of our plan to confess publicly our errors and shortcomings, I will ask Cadet Smith to give the true and full account of what happened to her at Butte."

A faint clapping of hands, a vociferous "God bless Cadet Smith!" here and there, and a removal of some of the restraints which muffled the wings of the spirit of expectancy greeted the ascent to the platform of a small, lithe young figure arrayed in the somber and quaint poke bonnet of the Army. Her face was a glowing crimson as she faced the audience, but her eyes were bright and her glance was firm, and the vigor of a strong and sturdy soul lent a certain grace of freedom to her pose.

"After I had served several months selling War Crys in San Francisco," she began with a steady voice which had acquired that plaintive quality so common among the hard workers in the cause, "I was sent to Butte, where there was a small corps of workers. They had become discouraged, and it was thought that my experience would help them a little. I didn't know that Butte was so different from San Francisco, and the members of the corps there didn't know it either, because they had never worked anywhere else. That is why they didn't tell me some things that I wish I had known more about.

"I started out the first day with about 200 War Crys. They looked surprised at the corps headquarters when I asked for so many, but I thought I could sell them.

"Of course I went into the hardest part of the town, and after I had visited one or two saloons and failed to sell a copy, I went into another one. A good many men were gambling. I had never seen anything but card playing in San Francisco, but they had wheels of fortune and a great many other things to gamble with. Several men were drinking at a bar. I went among them all and asked them to buy the paper, but they simply stared at me in wonder. The games began to stop, and then a big, fine-looking man with a broad-brimmed hat came up to me and said—and he said—he said: 'Hello, little Parson Sally, what do you want?' He said it just like that. He was so big and his voice was so deep—and he was so—"

"Out with it, Cadet!" cried a half dozen voices in the audience as the girl broke down, stammering and blushing.

"Handsome!" she added desperately, as though the saying of the word was a cross between martyrdom and the confession of a mortal sin. Great applause and laughter followed this declaration with an occasional: "God bless Cadet Annie!" This so overwhelmed the girl that her lips trembled and tears sprang into her eyes, and she cast a despairing, appealing glance toward one particular spot before her in the audience where she had not the courage to look before.

That single look was sufficient to rive the bonds of decorum which had held a giant in restraint, and the uprising of a towering frame sent the brigadier's program and discipline tumbling into chaos. The tall man approached and mounted the platform with the stride of a grenadier, while Cadet Annie gazed at him with a dismay which was still inefficient to quench the light of the stars that shone all the brighter in her eyes now that her cheeks had paled. Simultaneously a startled hush fell upon the audience, for although the familiar uniform of the Salvation Army sat upon the man's splendid frame, he was a stranger to all, and there was a commanding air about him that stilled all sounds.

He stalked to the girl's side and stood there facing the big crowd like a lion at bay in defense of his lair. An uncommonly handsome man he was, with swarthy face, jet black, wavy hair, worn long, and a formidable black mustache and imperial. These two made a strange picture as they stood side by side, she so small and seemingly so frail, he so tall and muscular and competent; she looked up at him, he ignoring her and sweeping the hall with a glance half of defiance, half of benignancy, and wholly of strength and mastery. AMONG THE FAIRIES.

BILLY JOHNSON, THE CAT TEASER.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

One day when Felinus and I were out in the pasture, just a little way back of the barn, Billy Johnson came along with a fishing pole over his shoulder and a tin spice box of fishworms in his hand.

"Hello, Walt!" said Billy.

"Hello, Billy!" said I. "Where are you going to fish?"

"Over the Burnt Swamp pond," said Billy. "There are lots of perch and hornpout there—just stacks of them. Sam Bilkins caught five perch and twelve hornpouts there last Saturday, and only fished two hours and a half."

"Oh, oh," said I, that's something like! But he must have caught them all, for the last time I went there I fished three hours and only caught one little shiner."

"Well," said Billy, "if you wouldn't always have an old cat tagging round, you might do something fishing, but you are so tied up to that big tiger cat you call Felinus that it is enough to scare all the good little fishes away. Such a cat, too, as that thing is enough to scare all the fish out of the water."

"See here, Billy, you needn't talk; you always have that little bunch of bones that you call a dog with you, and you might be a very decent fellow if you would let cats alone. That dog Flip of yours has killed two cats, and you set him on to both of them. If he doesn't scare good little fishes and bad ones, too, I miss my guess. Pooh! He's more fit to scare fishes than to start a beauty show anyhow."

Billy went along to his fishing and I kept at work picking up stones and carrying them in the wheelbarrow over to the old spring hole which we were filling up at the foot of the pasture.

After dinner I went out again, and there was Billy coming home across the pasture: but not a fish had he or any sign of one. Now, this was no fault of mine, but Billy was quick tempered.

"How many did you catch, Billy?" said I.

"Didn't catch any," said Billy. "What's going to happen Walt—you haven't got that giant of a cat with you. Guess the world must be on its last legs and just going to stop turning around long enough for you to find your dear old Felinus."

"Guess more likely the world will get dizzy turning around so often to watch that scarecrow of a dog," said I.

Billy was saucy enough on the cat question any time, but it nettled me more than anything else to have him tease Felinus: for I knew that Felinus was the largest and handsomest cat that ever lived. Any one could see, however, that Flip wasn't much of a dog anyway.

So you see how hard it was for me to keep my temper and hear my best friend abused.

What Billy and I said to each other after that was more earnest than polite.

Just then Felinus came around from back of the big rock near us and rubbed against my leg and said, "Pur-r-meow."

Billy did not understand, of course, but I knew that Felinus said, "Leave Billy and Flip for me to argue with."

Then Felinus walked up to Billy and tried to be pleasant and polite. He purred and rubbed his head against Billy and said, "Pur-meow." Billy clapped his hands and said: "Cats, Flip! Take him! Sic him, Flip!"

That just suited Flip, but when Felinus did not stir he was not so anxious for the fun. Billy was wild, and tired to urge Felinus leaped on Flip's back.

Flip on, until Felinus leaped upon Flip's back and pricked him a little with his claws.

Felinus did not hurt Flip much, but you would not like to have a cat larger than yourself on your back.

Wasn't there a frightened dog? Flip ran so fast and Billy was so much surprised that he couldn't say a word for a full minute.

I just roared with laugther and then said: "Just see that little bunch of bones running away with the dog collar. Hope the collar will come back some time."

Now it wasn't any funnier for Billy to have some one else make fun of his pet than it was for me to have him make fun of Felinus.

It made him so furious that he pulled the heavy club off his jointed fish pole and came at me as furiously as you ever saw a quick-tempered, angry boy.

Now, although I was not quarrelsome, yet Billy and the end of his fishpole were so near that all I could do was to jump and catch Billy's arm to take away the club. I never saw any boy so wild with anger. You can see, Billy was very quick tempered.

Just then Felinus flew up and took Billy in his paws as easily as an eagle would carry a chicken. Billy was a good swimmer and when he went fishing he always wore his old clothes. Felinus flew with him just over the place in the brook where we had made it deep and wide for the cattle to drink, and splash went Master Billy.

Now, as Felinus was invisible when his wings were spread, Billy did not understand what had happened to him, but as just then a large hen hawk flew overhead he decided that the hawk must have tried to carry him away.

Of course, the hawk came no nearer and Billy began again to get his courage. He picked up a stone about twice as large as your fist and threw it with all his might at Felinus. Felinus dodged behind the brush heap and in two seconds poor Billy was flying through the air again in Felinus's paws and splash he went again into the brook.

This time he was sure that no bird had done it, for he looked all around and came out of the water trembling with fear.

"What's happened, Walt," said he, "and what are you laughing at? Am I crazy or what is the matter?"

"Pur-r-r," said Felinus, so I said, "You have been carried away by your passions, Billy, and if you will never tell and never hurt another cat, I'll tell you the rest of the trouble."

Billy was so frightened that he promised, and Felinus said, "Meow," so I told Billy the whole story.

He would not believe it until Felinus had picked him up again and had hung him upon the lowest bough of the big chesnut tree, ten feet from the ground. Felinus left him there and Billy held fast to the branch.

Then I said, "Billy, Felinus will take you down." And Felinus took him down.

"Walt," said Billy, "I don't blame you for liking that cat. He's a dandy. He's the very handsomest cat I ever saw, but I always meant sometime to shoot or throw stones at him. I won't ever do it now, though."

Billy never told any one about his adventures with Felinus. He was not really so bad a boy as you may think, for when Sue Brown, the week before, had asked him to help Aunt Lucy Belcher by cutting wood and taking care of the cow Billy had been very glad to do it

His greatest fault was teasing cats, and now that Felinus had cured him of that Billy and I had many a good time together. Very few were the angry words that passed between us after Felinus took him in hand to educate.

Of course, Billy knew nothing of Fairyland, except that Felinus was a fairy flying cat.

He could not understand anything that Felinus said and never fully believed that I could.

After that terrible day poor Flip never chased cats, but for nearly a month he would drop his tail at the sight of Felinus and sing "Ki-y-i-ki-yi." But after a while he grew used to Felinus, and many a good time we four had together.

'Tis strange what a bundle of contradictions our lives all are—kind in some things and cruel in others.

Aunt Lucy, whom every one in the neighborhood called "Aunt," used to say that Felinus flew with him just over the brook.

Felinus was a wonderful cat and she was glad that there was one cat in the world that Billy Johnson did not hate.

"Billy is so kind to everything but cats," she used to say, "and lately he does not seem to trouble them."

Well might Aunt Lucy call Billy a kind boy, and also well might the cats of our neighborhood rejoice that Felinus, all unknown to any of them, had attended to the cat department of Billy Johnson's education.

ONE OF THEM WAS A TRAMP.

The way-train ahead of us had struck an open switch and been ditched, and two passengers were killed outright and five or six others more or less injured. The killed and injured were lying on the depot platform as our train came up, and among the latter was a professional tramp who had been stealing a ride. After the doctor had looked him over, the vagabond, who had not lost consciousness for a moment, smiled faintly and asked:

"Wall, pard, what's the verdict of the jury?"

"You are badly hurt," was the reply.

"I know that. I was right in the squeeze when the two cars cum together. I'm as flat as a pancake. Will I ever tramp agin?"

"I'm afraid not."

"Ar' my legs off?"

"No, but you are fatally injured, however."

"That means I'm a goner?"

"Yes."

"Wall, I'd have liked to got over this and had sunthin' to talk about and brag over, but I ain't doin' no kickin'. My pard was on the car ahead. Was he hurt?"

"No; here he is."

At that moment a ragged, unkempt and typical vagabond came forward and bent over the victim and asked:

"Wall, Jim, they say you hev to go?"

"Yes."

"How ye feelin' over it?"

"Sorter. No use ter kick, Tom."

"That's right; you never was no kicker nohow. Got any friends?"

"No."

"Want word taken to anybody?"

"No."

"Kin I do anythin' fur ye?"

The dying man gazed at him for a moment in silence and then whispered:

"Tom, ye ar' the only pardner I ever had who knowed the Lord's prayer. Jest say it over to me."

The old tramp pulled off his cap and knelt down, and as the score of us uncovered and bowed our heads he repeated the prayer word for word, and with such feeling as astonished everybody. When he had finished he rose up and said:

"That's it, Jim, and kin I do anythin' more?"

"Nothing more for him!" answered the doctor, as he looked down upon the pale face. "Your partner is dead!"—Detroit Free Press.

THE MINISTER'S IMITATIVE DOG.—"I have a dog," said a minister who had just heard a precocious story, "which is very sagacious. One Sunday he followed me to church and sat among the people and watched my movements in the pulpit. That afternoon I heard a terrible howling in my back yard, and of course, went to see what it meant. I found my dog was in the woodshed, standing on his hind legs in a dry goods box. He held down a torn almanac with one paw and gesticulated with the other, while he swayed his head and howled to an audience of four other dogs, even more sadly than I had done in the morning."—Danville, (Ky.) Advocate.

Mrs. Grisby—"People are so criminally careless about children's diseases. My Johnnie came down with the measles last month, and I've no idea where he took them." Johnnie—"I know." "The Caller—"And where was it, Johnnie?" Johnnie—"I took 'em to Sunday school, I did, and six boys got 'em from me, yes ma'am."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Reason.

My God, I love thee, not because
I hope for heaven thereby,
Nor because they who love thee not
Must burn eternally;
Not with the hope of gaining aught;
Not seeking a reward;
But as thyself hast loved me,
O ever loving Lord.
E'er so I love thee and will love,
And in thy praise will sing,
Solely because thou art my God
And my eternal king.

CONDENSATION.

"Blessed be the man that writes a small book."—Prof. A. F. Shauffler, D. D.

Why could not all great authors do for their readers what Robert Browning has done so well for his, in the selection from his works dedicated to Alfred Tennyson? Matthew Arnold and Wm. J. Rolf have done this for Wordsworth, each in his own way, with admirable skill, making a selection of his best and most characteristic poems in one small volume, which saves the necessity of plodding through his extensive works to find the gems which are all that many have time or opportunity to enjoy. Life is too short to do justice to all the authors of whom we would like to know something, when it can be done for us by competent hands so much better than we can do it. There are several editions of Wordsworth's poems, one in three large volumes, another in one larger volume, but the small edition prepared by Rolf, published by Harper & Brothers, with choice illustrations and notes, is the most satisfactory for common use, taking you into the very heart of "Wordsworthshire" without the fatigue of a journey thither. A similar compilation from Whittier's poems is greatly needed, such as he would have made, who wrote poetry with such facility and in such abundance that he would gladly have had some of it omitted in his final edition.

Some ardent admirer of Byron has prepared a complete edition of his works in one huge volume of 800 pages, weighing exactly four pounds, containing all the objectionable things he ever wrote. Nobody wants such a book for ordinary use. Mutum in parvo is the best rule, and Bryon more than any other poet needs not only a condensed but an expurgated edition.

Another huge souvenir volume was published a few years ago entitled "Signal Lights," containing thirty-six addresses and sermons on practical themes, each illustrated with a picture of the writer, Bp. John H. Vincent heading the list, followed by ex-president Hill of Harvard University, Mrs. H. W. Beecher, Miss Francis E. Willard, et al. The volume is weighty in matter, no doubt, but who wants to hold a book weighing five pounds avoirdupois even long enough to read one of this long list of "Signal Lights?"

An attempt was made a few years ago to publish some of the best novels, condensed about one-half from the original size, beginning with Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe," but the enterprise was not heartily seconded, and it was soon dropped. A later and more successful effort has been made to get new works of fiction in a much narrower compass than those of Scott, Dickins, and others. And since "of making many books there is no end," and a thousand other things more important than reading interminable novels are imperatively waiting to be done, it is greatly to be desired and hoped that this plan may be persisted in. And so we close as we began, with the benediction: "Blessed be the man that writes a small book."

HER WAIST NO LONGER SLENDER.

It is matter for rejoicing that fashion is no longer to decree a slender waist as something indispensable to propriety and grace. The natural waist of the woman of average height is about 28 inches, and any less size is attained only through arresting development, or compression by means of whalebone and steel. The amount of room inside these 28 inches is absolutely needed for the proper working of the machinery of the internal economy. In spite of this fact girls very often bind the yielding ribs into such narrow compass that the waist measures 20 or 22 inches only, and you will now and then hear some mother of a family, with a very different waist now, boast as if it were something to be proud of that when she was 19 her waist measure was 19, too. It is, however, of no use to talk to young people about the injurious effect of compression on stomach, heart, lungs, liver and arterial system. They are not anatomists, and they do not comprehend the matter nor want to do so; they observe that they feel as well now as they did before, and without weighing the thought that it requires time to work ruin, take it for granted that they always will feel as well, although they have been told and taught that in post-mortem examinations it has been found that wherever tight lacing has been the rule, every organ was out of place and seriously injured. But although it does move them a trifle to be told that red noses and eruptive skins and flat chests are to be laid to the account of the too slender waist, yet on the whole neither common sense nor auld

The Journal.

FRIDAY EVENING, JULY 31, 1896

MR. BRYAN will be "officially" notified of his nomination for the presidency on the Democratic ticket at Madison Square Garden, New York, August 12th, when the managers are planning for a grand demonstration.

BRYAN says he won't accept the Populist nomination, but the Pops are cute enough not to notify him, and of course he can't decline a thing he hasn't been offered. They'll all vote for him in November, and probably by that time Mr. Bryan will be perfectly willing to have the votes counted in without question.

MCKINLEY'S manager, Mark Hanna, has been in New York this week and announces that "Our position is in favor of sound money and a protective tariff; mind, I do not mean a high tariff by any means." In view of McKinley's past view on that question it is appropriate to remark, "The king is dead; long live the king."

THE Democratic candidate for governor in Maine, Edward B. Winslow of Portland, has declined to run. Winslow was nominated on a gold platform before the Chicago convention, but with Sewall as a candidate for the vice presidency on a silver basis, things assumed a decidedly peculiar look, so Mr. Winslow steps down, to let in a silver man, probably.

ONE Maine farmer learned a practical lesson on the money question the other day, though it was rather expensive. He had no faith in banks, so kept his money in the barn, where he had $200 in gold in one bag and $200 in silver in another. When he had fished the two metals out of the ruins after the barn had burned he got $200 for the gold and $120 for the silver.

IT IS just a little awkward, this having one head and two tails to the Democratic—Populist national ticket, and the question is which tail can wag hard enough to shake off the other. Sewall says the Populist convention did not change his plans a particle, while Watson confidently announces that he will be the only candidate for second place on the ticket in November. Will the matter have a Kilkenny cat termination?

THERE is a prospect of lively times within the Democratic party in Massachusetts this fall. George Fred Williams asked the state committee to pass a resolution endorsing the Chicago platform, but the committee decided that the state convention was the proper body to act on that point. Then Mr. Williams wanted the state convention held at Worcester September 3d, and the committee voted to hold it in Boston September 24th. George Fred is real mad about it, and proposes to fight the committee from now until election day. Ex-Mayor Matthews of Boston will lead the anti-Bryanites, and the fight is on.

NEXT Tuesday is the time of the county commissioners' meeting for the purpose of rearranging the county into new representative districts according to the last census. There will be thirteen districts, as now, but how to arrange them is what is worrying the commissioners. The average number of votes to each district is 2428, and towns comprising a district must be contiguous. T. M. Brown, one of the commissioners, has been looking over the ground and makes these suggestions: That Palmer, Monson, Brimfield, Wales and Holland be made into one district; Wilbraham, Hampden, Longmeadow, East Longmeadow, and wards 6, 7 and 8 of Springfield be made into a double district; wards 3, 4 and 5 of Springfield would make another double district; West Springfield he would combined with wards 1 and 2 of Springfield, leaving Westfield to take in Agawam and Southwick, while Ludlow would go with Chicopee. County Commissioner Brainerd makes the same suggestion regarding the eastern district, but would put Longmeadow and East Longmeadow in with eight other small towns west of the river for a district. Ludlow, Wilbraham, Hampden and ward 8 of Springfield would make a district, while West Springfield and ward 6 of Springfield would make another. Wards 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Springfield he suggests making into two double districts.

THE special committee appointed by the voters of Palmer to examine the condition of the schoolhouses ordered repaired by the state inspectors, has called a town meeting for the 8th of August, when it will make a report. This report will show that an expenditure of about $400 must be made on the Three Rivers building before the scholars will be allowed to go into it again. With regard to the Depot village, about $3000 must be expended before it will satisfy the requirements, and it is then at best only an old structure, sadly patched and illy adapted for the uses to which it must be put. In addition to this, if allowed to stand it must be shingled at once. Whatever may be done this year, within five years both of these buildings must be replaced with new ones. It is understood that if the town should vote to build a new building there next year the inspectors would allow the building to remain in its present condition until that time. In view of these facts, is it wise for the town to lay out this sum of money on the old structure?—to put its money into a bag full of holes, large and decidedly visible holes? With two new schoolhouses absolutely necessary within five years, there will be no better time in which to build them than next summer. They will cost about $40,000 for the two. Bond the town for them and build them. The interest on the bonds would be not over $1600 a year; to this add $2000 for a sinking fund, and the amount to be raised is only $3600 a year, certainly not a large sum to pay for permanent improvements.

THE Populist convention at St. Louis last week endorsed Bryan for president, but couldn't find any use for Sewall, and for vice president nominated Thomas E. Watson of Georgia. When it became evident that Sewall was not in favor, Bryan was wired to and replied to have his name withdrawn if Sewall was not nominated, but the convention was bound to endorse Bryan. The platform demands "A national money, safe and sound, issued by the general government only, without the intervention of banks, a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and a means of distribution direct to the people through the lawful disbursements of the government; free and unrestricted coinage of gold and silver at 16 to 1; a speedy increase in the volume of the circulating medium to an amount sufficient to meet the demands of business and population and restore the prices of labor and production; that no more bonds be issued except by specific act of Congress; legislation to prevent the demonetization of the lawful money of the United States by private contract; that the government use its option as to the kind of lawful money in which its obligations shall be paid; a graduated income tax; the establishment of postal savings banks by the government; government ownership of railroad, telegraph and telephone lines; all lands held by railroads and other corporations in excess of actual needs to revert to the government, and alien ownership of land to be prohibited; the election of the president, vice president and senators by direct vote of the people; public salaries to correspond with the price of labor and its products, and in times of industrial depression the employment of idle labor on public works; the admission of the territories as states, and just pensions for disabled Union soldiers."

PALMER NEWS.

A CHAPTER ON COLLECTING FADS.

Including the Latest, Which is Causing the Postmasters to Say Unkind Things About the Collectors.

If the mania for making collections of various articles had been inaugurated when Solomon wrote "Of making many books there is no end," he might well have included it in his remark, for it is giving the books a hard push for the illimitability record. There are collecting fads galore. And they change almost as often as the seasons, a new one coming into vogue about as soon as the one before it gets fairly under way. Nearly every small boy—and a large number of his sisters—has the stamp collecting fever in a more or less violent form, but it usually soon dies out, or lies dormant until he arrives at an age when he can appreciate the commercial value of a good collection. Should it break out anew then he will have the disease in an aggravated form, and it will take numerous of his hard-earned dollars before a cure is effected by even a passable collection, for the varieties of stamps are legion, and some cost big money.

It must be confessed that the collecting fad is confined largely to men, though women are by no means free from it. There was a time not long ago when crazy patchwork was all the rage, and the young man who could wear a respectable silk necktie out in an evening and not lose a few pieces off the end was indeed in luck. The objective has changed frequently, and now, among the young ladies especially, is largely confined to a gathering of monograms and headings cut from the engraved stationery so much used by individuals and in college towns. The monogram or date line is cut out or pasted on the owner's fan, the arrangement in some instances being very artistic. The success of the collector is of course judged by the number of clippings, and some have large fans covered on both sides, no two slips being alike.

All are of course familiar with the rise and fall of the autograph collecting craze, and there are few people whose signatures have not been scattered to the four winds of the heavens and numerous intermediate points and way stations by importunate youngsters with a desire to fill their book. The badge collector is one of the recent acquisitions to the ranks, and runs riot at the large gatherings, such as the G. A. R. national encampment, the Y. P. S. C. E. conventions, and the like. A few arrange the badges thus acquired into a banner and have it framed, some being decidedly artistic and quite valuable, as is one made from badges collected at the recent conclave of the Knights Templar in Boston. Then there is the postal card, the post-mark, the visiting card, the campaign button, and a thousand and one other collectors, each a little more daft on his particular fad than his neighbor.

But the latest, or at least one of the latest, for it has not become general as yet, is the one for collecting money orders. This is an outcome of the stamp collecting mania, and is fast driving into nervous prostration the postmasters who have been inflicted with it. The government has changed the form of its postal money orders several times recently, and with each change a collector must have one of the new ones to make his collection complete. So he goes to the post office and asks for an order for one cent, payable to the order of Andrew Johnson, in Denver, or some other man in some other place. The postmaster knows what is in store for him, but he dare not refuse the application. The letter of advice is forwarded to Denver, and in a short time comes back a request for better directions as to street address. Then begin the postmaster's troubles. He can give no better address and writes to that effect. In a short time another letter comes, and they keep coming until, in order to cut all the red tape necessary he has had to write eight explanatory epistles. If he is in a city he must make weekly—if in the country, fortnightly—returns of the unpaid orders on hand, doing this for a year. Then the unpaid order is sent to headquarters at Washington and there preserved. The government is in the amount of the order and its original cost,—a total of four cents,—while the average postmaster's record for piety moves in inverse ratio to his accumulation of such orders. And as some collectors show orders drawn on all the principal cities of the country, it will be seen that they have much to answer for.

Of Interest to Boys and Girls.

In another column on this page will be found a description of the prizes which the JOURNAL will give to the boys or girls in return for new subscribers. Here is a chance for some boys and girls to get a gold watch which will last them a lifetime and do good service. The plan is a simple one: The boy or girl who sends the JOURNAL the largest number of new subscribers during the month of August will be given a handsome American gold filled watch, ruby jeweled, compensating balance, stem wind, with handsomely engraved case, warranted in every respect for 20 years and valued at $18; the boy or girl sending the second largest number will receive a gold-filled watch, fully warranted, valued at $12; the sender of the third largest list will get a handsome nickel case watch, warranted a good timekeeper. As an additional incentive to the boys and girls, a commission of 25 cents will be given on each subscription, so that if a worker fails to secure one of the prizes he or she will still receive good pay for their work. Here's a chance for the boys and girls to make a little money during the vacation time, and possibly obtain a fine gold watch free. Read about it in the special announcement and send for your subscription blanks.

The Grubs are Still With Us.

The article in last week's JOURNAL regarding the grubs which were working such havoc in the lawns about town was a revelation to many people of the cause of their ruined lawns. Some who had paid no particular attention to their lawns except to keep the grass cut began an investigation, and in numerous instances found that the grub had been there ahead of them. One man who began to look his lawn over ended by gathering several quarts of the pest and then digging up and refilling a place about 25 feet in diameter; and he is not alone in his experience. No sure remedy seems to have been suggested yet, though one person thinks that salt thrown on the grass and then washed in with the hose will keep them out, at least he has tried it and manages to keep away the grub. Care must be taken however not to put on too much salt, or the grass will be killed. A report comes from Monson that wood ashes distributed on the grass before a rain, or thoroughly washed in with a hose, will kill them, lye having been found to be fatal. As wood ashes are a good fertilizer, this remedy, if effective, will serve two purposes.

Hat Shop to Run Again.

The announcement was made yesterday morning that the hat shop would run again the coming season, Mr. Jesse A. Rogers being authority for the statement that arrangements had been completed for starting the business again, and that bleaching would commence next month. The concern will bear a different name from that by which it has been known, though just what it will be has not yet been decided; this will be made known later.

There will be general rejoicing among the townspeople that the plant is not to remain idle. The works have furnished employment to a considerable number of people, many of whom have come here from other towns; the pay roll of the concern added no insignificant sum to the amount of money spent in town, and the merchants will be glad that this is not to be lost.

Goodrich's show passed through the town Thursday morning on its way to Monson.

Rev. C. R. Minard of the Baptist church will preach next Sunday morning on "The love of Christ."

Rev. H. H. Pratt of West Springfield occupied the pulpit at the Baptist church last Sunday morning.

C. R. Hoppee has moved into the tenement on Pleasant street previously occupied by Charles Shaw.

Mr. Hamilton will preach in the Advent chapel next Sunday afternoon at 3 30. All are cordially invited.

The probate court at Springfield Wednesday allowed the will of Mrs. Laura E. Child, late of Palmer, W. C. Dewey executor.

Ralph LeGro and Ned Gardner have placed their sailing yacht in the waters at Forest Lake. The launch was successfully made yesterday afternoon.

The school board has awarded the contract for bringing the scholars from Thorndike to the high school to George Whiting, he being the lowest of four bidders.

The second nine of Palmer would like to meet the first nine of Monson in a game of ball for any sum between $25 and $100. Correspondence should be addressed to Rooney and Nelson, Palmer.

There will be no preaching service in St. Paul's church Sunday morning. The Y. P. C. U. will hold a laymen's meeting in the evening at 7 o'clock. The services will be in charge of E. C. Gould.

J. B. Longwill has received news from Scotland of the death of a brother there; also news of the death at Worcester of another brother's child. Mr. Longwill's own little one is sick with cholera infantum and not expected to live.

Special rates have been made on the Boston and Albany railroad so that on Wednesday the fare to Springfield, including admission to Hampden Park, where the barbecue is to be given by the Springfield Retail Butcher's and Grocer's Association, will be 70 cents.

A picked ball nine from this place went to Monson to try conclusions with the ball tossers of that town last Saturday. The game was marred by constant kicking on the part of both teams. In the fifth inning the air became so condensed with wrangling that the players could not breathe and had to leave the field. The score stood 16 to 13 in favor of Palmer.

After considerable discussion it is probable that nothing will be done this summer in the way of changing the interior of the opera house to make it better adapted for show purposes, much to the regret of the theater-going puplic. The resignation of A. H. Hills as manager of the house has not yet been accepted, but it probably will be, and A. E. Fitch appointed in his place.

The marriage of Samuel W. Allyn of Holyoke and Miss Emma L. Lent was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents, near Palmer Center, Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. F. Moulton of the Universalist church. Only intimate friends and relatives were present. Mr. and Mrs. Allyn left in the evening for a wedding tour, after which they will reside in Holyoke.

The ways of the house servant are at times mysterious and past finding out. One who came from Springfield a few days ago to work for a Palmer woman sat in the depot carriage which carried her and her trunk to her prospective place, looked over the outside of the house, and concluding that its dimensions were larger than suited her, ordered the driver to take her back to the station at once.

Repairs on the steeple of the Universalist church are once more progressing, and unless all indications fail, will not again be brought to a standstill. The men at work under Contractor Marcy come from Ware and are not the least bit afraid to go heavenward; the higher they ascend the more they seem to be at home. The staging is now up as high as the slated part of the steeple.

Holden & Fuller's woolen mill will not run to-morrow, and unless orders are received will probably shut down the fore part of next week for an indefinite period. The mill got out an unusually large line of samples last spring, and received in May more than the usual number of sample orders, but reorders have been few and the firm does not propose to pile up the goods on an uncertainty.

Sig. Santelle's big one-ring circus exhibits here to-morrow on the Thorndike street circus lot, both afternoon and evening. This show does not advertise to be the greatest, but the best 25-cent show in the world. All children under 10 years of age will be admitted to the afternoon performance for ten cents. Performances begin at 2 and 8 p. m. There will be a grand street parade at noon.

A peripatetic umbrella mender and sharpener of scissors made his way into town on Tuesday and meandered up and down the streets without striking a job or seeing many inhabitants. Finally he discovered one man at work on a lawn and made inquiry as to the state of affairs in the place. He seemed relieved when told that it was only the annual excursion of the merchants which accounted for the closed stores and the absence of people, for he had thought from the deserted appearance of the town that possibly an epidemic had taken off a large portion of the residents.

The Boston and Albany road will give one of its popular excursions to Nantasket Beach, Downer Landing, or Bass Point and Nahant next Friday. The fare for the round trip is $1 45. A special train will leave North Wilbraham at 6 53 a. m., Palmer at 7.05, West Brimfield at 7.15, West Warren at 7.25 and Warren at 7.31. The return special leaves Boston at 7.25 p. m. Coupons 2-3-4 will admit to the national league baseball game between Boston and Washington. Only a limited number of tickets will be sold. This will be the only excursion over the road to these places this season. For further particulars, see advertisement in another column.

G. M. Atkins & Co. have the contract to build a bridge on the Ware River branch of the Boston and Albany railroad at Gibbs's crossing, on the highway to Ware. Piles have been driven for the work and the tracks will be placed on a trestle next week Sunday. The work of building the bridge will be pushed as fast as possible. Since the operation of the Central Massachusetts line this crossing has been one of the most dangerous in this vicinity, as the road crosses the two tracks, which are close together, at an angle. The Central road built a bridge and its share of the grading for a separation of the highway and the tracks over two years ago ,but the Boston and Albany road has put the matter off until now.

A new directory has been issued by the New England Telephone and Telegraph Company, and with it several changes have gone into effect. The practice of notifying customers of the expiration of their five-minute periods will be discontinued, and the charge for service beyond the five-minute period will be made at the rate of one-fifth of the present five-minute rate for each minute or fraction thereof. Heretofore, when a person has tried to get an out-of-town party, for instance a party in Springfield, no charge has been made if the party could not be found. Hereafter a charge of 15 cents on rates not exceeding 50 cents, and a charge of 25 cents on rates not exceeding $1, will be made. The rate between Bondsville and Belchertown has been reduced from 25 to 20 cents.

At a recent meeting of the Palmer Race Meet Association G. A. Moore was chosen manager of the bicycle tournament to be held on Labor Day. The most successful meet ever held here was the one last year. At that time a half mile was done in 1.02 and a mile was done in 2.13, the track record. This meet was under the personal management of Mr. Moore, and judging from the past, the coming meet will be a great success. Every effort will be made to make this a greater success than was last year's. The tournament has already been sanctioned by the L. A. W., and the track has been hired, and special pains will be taken to put it in good condition. Prizes of sufficient value to attract good riders will be put up, and several fast men are being negotiated with. All the races will be paced by a tandem, and an effort will be made to lower the track record. Without a doubt it will be the best tournament ever held in Palmer.

The town bore a Sunday aspect Tuesday, the stores being closed, and few people on the streets. The reason for this was that many people attended the merchants' excursion to Watch Hill and Block Island. Over 350 tickets were sold. The unfortunate experience last year materially affected the attendance this year. Last year over 600 attended the excursion, and when they arrived at New London they found the boat pretty well filled with transient passengers; with the large number from Palmer it was uncomfortably crowded. Then the handling of so large a crowd and the rough weather made the boat late in getting into New London and consequently it was very late when they arrived home. But this year the railroad showed its ability to handle a large crowd by taking them down in good season, and although the boat was a little late in getting to New London, brought them back to Palmer at 7.15 p. m. All who attended had an enjoyable time.

Tucker—Wilkins Wedding.

The society event of the week was the marriage, Wednesday, of Helen Bradley Tucker, oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson M. Tucker, and Joseph Wilkins of Washington, D. C. Both of the contracting parties are well known among a large circle of friends, and are very popular. Miss Tucker was a member of the class of '91, Monson Academy, and was valedictorian of her class. After taking a post-graduate course she entered Smith College for a two-years' course, and returning taught English and had charge of the library at the Academy for two years. Mr. Wilkins is a successful business man of Washington, D. C., being associated with his brother under the firm name of Wilkins & Co.

The ceremony took place at four o'clock at the home of the bride's parents on Granite street, Rev. F. S. Hatch of the Congregational church officiating. The full Episcopal service with a ring was used. Arthur S. Wilkins, brother of the groom, was best man, and Miss Mabel F., sister of the bride, was maid of honor. The ushers were George Tucker and Clarence Burt, brother and cousin of the bride. Promptly at the appointed hour the bridal procession entered the front parlor, marching to strains of Lohengrin's Wedding March, played by Miss Margaret Williams of Amherst. The procession was led by the ushers, who were immediately followed by two little girls, Rosalie and Florence Burt, who scattered roses in the pathway. Next came the groom and best man, then the maid of honor, alone, followed by the bride, accompanied by her father and carrying a bunch of roses. The couple stood on a mat of roses during the ceremony. The bride wore a dress of white taffeta silk and the wedding veil worn by her mother at her marriage 25 years ago. The veil was fastened on by a diamond brooch, a gift of the groom. At the close of the ceremony Miss Williams rendered Mendelssohn's march.

The decorations were very pretty, and were made up in the hallway of golden-rod and ferns, in the back parlor of sweet peas and ferns, and in the front parlor of roses and ferns. There were many valuable presents of silverware, cut glass, pictures and money. The wedding was private, only the relatives and most intimate friends of the family being present. Among the out-of-town guests were Mrs. Wilkins, Miss Wilkins, Mr. and Mrs. Walter P. Wilkins and Arthur S. Wilkins of Washington, D. C., Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Prentis of Philadelphia, Arthur Leland and W. F. Fitzgerald of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. William Burt of Greenfield, Mrs. Burt, Miss May Burt, Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Pease of the Academy, Miss Alice Park, Miss Lula Vaille, Misses Idella and Mary Anderson, Mr. and Mrs. Alonzo Beebe, Eugene Cook, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Cushman, S. F. Cushman and Miss Hattie Cushman.

The allotted work on sidewalks was completed this week, and Main street now has concrete on one side nearly its entire length. A much-needed strip of concrete has been laid from North Main street to the depot, and the rest of the appropriation was used where it was most needed. With the work on the roads now in progress Monson compares most favorably with other towns in regard to its roads and sidewalks.

The game last Saturday with the Palmer team ended with a "kick," during which the visiting nine picked up their apparatus and went home. The adjourned meeting of the board of trustees and stewards of the Methodist church was held Monday evening to consider the proposed church improvements and to hear the reports of the committees on estimates appointed at a previous meeting. These reports were read and the committee placed the cost of the proposed improvements at a little over $2000. Of this $800 is assured, and it was thought that the balance could be raised, and a committee of six—C. A. Bradway, Joel H. Thompson, H. A. Felton, F. M. King, Mrs. H. E. Bugbee and Miss Mattie Collis—was appointed to solicit funds. The improvements proposed are badly needed, and some of the furnishings have reached a point of dilapidation which makes it practically compulsory to renew them. The committee should meet with success in its endeavors to raise the necessary funds.

TO BE COMFORTABLE

During the Hot Season.

Persons who care to keep comfortable during the hot weather should look more particularly to their food and drink than to clothing. Use wheat or oatmeal for breakfast with a little fruit, bread and butter and a cup of hot Postum Cereal; this beverage is not coffee exactly, although it looks like the best of coffee. It is a liquid food made of grains and is highly nourishing.

Avoid iced drinks at meals, as the stomach depends upon heat very largely in its digestive, operations and the ice cold drinks seriously interfere with the work. If one's stomach is kept right in the hot weather it is much easier to keep comfortable and well. Hot nourishing drinks at meals are sensible, and Postal Cereal perfectly meets the want.

Beware of fraudulent imitations of the original Postum Cereal Grain coffee. Insist on Postum.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. Won't keep store or house without it." Get a free trial of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Mrs. Rhodie Noah, of this place, was taken in the night with cramping pains and the next day diarrhoea set in. She took half a bottle of blackberry cordial but got no relief. She then sent to me to see if I had anything that would help her. I sent her a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and the first dose relieved her. Another of our neighbors had been sick for about a week and had tried different remedies for diarrhoea but kept getting worse. I sent him this same remedy. Only four doses of it were required to cure him. He says he owes his recovery to this wonderful remedy.—Mrs. Mary Sibley, Sidney, Mich. For sale by O. P. Allen, Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

This certainly is the best medicine ever put on the market for dysentery, summer complaint, colic and cholera infantum in children. It never fails to give prompt relief when used in reasonable time and the plain printed directions are followed. Many mothers have expressed their sincere gratitude for the cures it has effected. For sale by O. P. Allen. Palmer; Paige & Mason, Three Rivers; G. L. Keeney, Monson; A. P. Adams, Thorndike; William Kennedy, Ware.

The Land of Evangeline.

The London Publishers' Circular on Prof. Charles G. D. Roberts' book.

(The London Publishers' Circular.)

From the Dominion Atlantic Railway Co., Kentville, Nova Scotia.—The Land of Evangeline and the Catweays Thither, by Charles G. D. Roberts; illustrated. Longfellow has done for this romantic part of Nova Scotia what Scott did for the most romantic part of Scotland. As thousands of tourists annually visit the Trossachs and Loch Lomond because the wizard of the north chanced to cast the glamour of his genius upon these places, so Nova Scotia promises to become a fashionable playground because the sweetest of American poets has celebrated in immortal verse the beauties of Evangeline's Land. Professor Robert's little book is intended for the use of the people visiting that charmed spot for the first time. But it also describes Nova Scotia in general, and the descriptions are such as to make us wish to be off to that land of fruit and perfume. The book was, of course, written primarily in the interest of the Dominion Atlantic railway, which pierces the bets and most attractive parts of Nova Scotia, but the volume is something more than a mere guide book. Professor Roberts, who is probably the best known of Canadian writers, contrives to give a wonderful mass of information in a really interesting manner. One of his great merits is that he does not over-color his picture; he does not make Nova Scotia all paradise, yet the impression left on the reader's mind is that on the whole it must be a delightful place. The intending visitor will find in the little book not only all essential information about the principal towns and summer resorts in the country, but about the game laws, fishing, shooting, and so forth, as well as about hotels, steamers, and railways; in a word, about all that concerns the tourest and traveler. The volume is nicely printed, is a handy shape, and is liberally illustrated.

Copies of above booklet will be mailed free by writing to Mr. J. F. Masters, Agent of Dominion Atlantic Ry., 228 Washington St., Boston.

A LOST CRAVAT.

When I was in Paris I was poor—very poor. Like so many others, I hoped to find there both fortune and glory. I hoped to become a great painter, and I was only 20 years old. While I was waiting for fame and fortune, both of which, I am glad to say, came at last, I breakfasted and dined very lightly. Sometimes I did not breakfast at all, and I often, as our English friends say, dined with Duke Humphrey. How in the world I ever succeeded in living I cannot now explain. Ah, youth, youth, all-powerful talisman that you are! I had youth. Now that I have won fortune, nothing has ever rendered me so happy as in those days when, although poor, I felt life bounding within me. I lived then. I was poor as Job, yet richer than Croesus.

A worthy shop-keeper in the country town from which I came wrote to me, out of the goodness of his heart, and gave me an order to make a copy of a Teniers. At once, full of ardor, I hastened to the great gallery of the Louvre. From the very first day I did good work. That I was thus going to earn some money made me work, but the pleasure I experienced in copying a favorite picture made me work quickly and well. Ah, the pictures of Teniers! What sensations they awakened in my being, these fat and burstng burghers, with their plump and rubicund cheeks, the laughter wrinkles around their pop-eyes, thrusting their jolly noses into their tankards! There was no sentiment of envy roused in me in gazing upon their pictured merriment. But I did think that if I could have taken myself away from the unquiet life of Paris, from our noisy streets, from our modern houses, I would have preferred to share their life—that of sitting under grape arbors, wassailing, singing and clinking pots.

The third morning after my task had begun I repaired to the Louvre. Just as I was about to enter, the officious guardian, in his green and gold uniform, made me an agitated sign, carrying his hand to his neck. I remembered having seen the same gesture at the theater. Don't you remember that when Don Caesar de Bazan hears the news that he is going to be hanged, he puts his hand to his neck and feels of it as if he already felt the fatal cord? Just so gesticulated the green and gilt guardian. I stared at him stupidly, and then looked around me. Anybody in sight? Coming around the corner was a young woman, but she was invisible to him. There was nobody else. Evidently it was to me that this funeral gesture was addressed. I did not understand him and therefore crossed the threshold. I had scarce ascended three steps of the staircase, when a loud cry resounded behind me: "Stop—you have no cravat!"

Imitating the gesture of Don Caesar de Bazan I carried my hand to my neck. Alas, it was true! I had lost my cravat.

Don't laugh. I didn't laugh. It was my only cravat. It was one of those cheap, black knots which are fastened around the collar button with a rubber band. Five minutes before entering the court-yard of the Louvre I had stopped in the Rue de Rivoli, gazed at myself complacently in a shop window mirror and had adjusted my cravat. Alas! I had done more than adjust my cravat—I had lost it.

"It is against the rules," said the guardian, severely, "to permit any one to enter the gallery without a cravat."

Well, he was right. There must be rules in the great national galleries and while they will admit shabby people, they will not admit people in rags, in their shirt sleeves or without cravats.

At this moment the lady who had been rounding the corner passed near me. I felt myself growing red and pale at once, and I turned in the direction of my guardian in order to look away from the pretty visitor, who, as she passed, brushed me with her silken gown. She wore the prettiest little blue cravat around her neck that one could imagine. Yes, I couldn't help but notice it in looking out of the corner of my eye at her white neck.

I stood there stunned. The guardian enjoyed my consternation. He was happy. In this moment he exercised the exalted pleasure of authority. A policeman who orders you to "move on" experiences the same secret joy. It is that feeling, doubtless, which actuated Caesar and Napoleon.

I remained there for some minutes, gazing at this little great man. I had nothing in my wardrobe which resembled in the slightdegree a cravat, and I had not a penny about me with which to buy one. To whom could I address myself. I was from the country. I knew no one in Paris. I had no comrades from which I could borrow a knot of ribbon What a humiliation! And yet, above there in the gallery, the wassailers were waiting for me, laughing and drinking under the grape arbor.

I left the vestibule. I entered the great square of the Louvre, and crossed it mechanically. Yet as I did so I felt instinctively that there was some one following me. I divined that it was a woman, and that it was the woman whom I had met in the door, and who had turned and redescended the staircase at the moment of my misadventure. Why had she followed me? Had I not turned my face in order to avoid her glance? Heaven preserve us from such inquisitive people.

She overtook me. It was in truth the lady of the staircase. She stopped in front of me, looking at me timidly, with a charming embarassment. She seemed moved and troubled. Her beautiful eyes were teardimmed. But, said I to myself, what has become of the pretty ribbon she just wore around her neck? Her hands were buried in a rich muff. As she stopped and looked at me, she withdrew one of her hands from her muff. I saw in her fingers the light-blue silk cravat, ornamented at its ends with white lace. "An entrance ticket," said she to me, in a half-whisper, and she hurried away.

Here the artist stopped, and meditated long.

"You followed her, I suppose?" asked his friend.

"I never dreamed of it for a moment. The wassailers of the Teniers were waiting for me."

"And you entered the Louvre in a blue cravat with lace ends?"

"Without the least affectation, without false shame, and perhaps with a certain pride as I triumphantly passed the green and gold guardian at the door."

"And you found her some day somewhere, this pretty woman, at the sea-side, in the mountains, in society? No? But you are married—did she not become your wife?"

"I did not say," remarked the painter, dryly.

"But your story is not finished."

"I am a painter, my dear boy. I finish pictures, but I never knew how to finish a story."

Merchant—"What! back again so soon? I never knew you to do an errand so quickly as that before." Messenger Boy—"No, I guess you didn't. I hung on behind a hearse."—Somerville Journal.

Why

Do people buy Hood's Sarsaparilla in preference to any other,—in fact almost to the exclusion of all others?

Because

They know from actual use that Hood's is the best, i. e., it cures when others fail. Hood's Sarsaparilla is still made under the personal supervision of the educated pharmacists who originated it.

The question of best is just as positively decided in favor of Hood's as the question of comparative sales.

Another thing: Every advertisement of Hood's Sarsaparilla is true, is honest.

THE FIRST OCCASION.—The caution of the Aberdonian in giving an answer to a direct question was well illustrated the other day, when I asked an eastern friend of mine, whose family were not noted for very active habits: "Was not your father's death very sudden?" Slowly drawing one hand from his pocket, and pulling down his beard, the interrogated one cautiously replied: "Ay, it was unco' sudden for him. HE HAD ENOUGH PRESENCE OF MIND.

"It's a great thing, presence of mind, and I always regret that somehow I don't think of the right thing until the wrong time."

The speaker was a man whose mustache and hair showed the winter of life was near. His eye was piercing, not shifty, and his clothing and adornments betokened comfortable circumstances.

"I was guard on the Big Bend stage, I had been a gambler for 20 years. I knew all the tricks, and had played every game in all sorts of ways and with every kind of device. It was just such a night as this, the very gentlest of breezes, the moon so bright one could read by it, and the road through the woods was as a white ribbon. We were bowling along quietly enough up a grade, when at a little turn we met two horsemen coming at a smashing gallop. They threw their horses back on their haunches, and we were held up.

"Passengers, driver and all were stood up in a row, and one of the bandits guarded us while his partner, Pete, he called him, was soon at work on the box. I suspected the driver of connivance, for when we heard the horses he said it was a courier coming; he knew of the trip, and so threw me off my guard. I was put in a line alongside the reinsman, and while I had both eyes on the guard and his partner, not a move of that rascally driver escaped me.

"Of course we all had our hands in the air,—and right here let me explain a little point. Did you ever see a poker hold-out? It's an ingenious contrivance which fits beneath your clothing, with an arm extending down the sleeves of your coat on the inside, so regulated that by a pressure of the elbow the clip at the end is at the wrist to grip a card or out of sight up the arms. It is a handy affair not to be caught with, too, for it is prima facie evidence, and hanging's too little for a man who is known to be ready to play with the contrivence about him. When I quit the game I had a set of 'em; I took 'em from a fellow from the bay who came up to earn an honest dollar, I wouldn't sell 'em or give 'em away: some one might think I used such things myself. So I jest quietly worked a patent. I got a pair of single-shot derringers, which would lie in the crook of my arm and not rest hard, and I fastened 'em to either clip of them holdouts. Of course, when my hands was up the derringers lay snug against my forearm. I had practiced with 'em lots and knew just how to cramp my elbows, drop my arms a little and have the little barkers in my hands.

"I was gradually letting my hands down once; that is, I was testing the thing, when the guard called me up sharp, fearing something, and made me move away a mite from the line, where he could watch me particular and keep the passengers covered as well. He ordered everybody to keep still, too, for there was a little bit of sobbing by a woman in the party, and a sniveling drummer was bemoaning his fate. Pete was not doing good business with the box, though, for he was clubbing away with a hammer, but not making any headway at opening the little safe.

"Suddenly the opening came. The guard was getting impatient and cursing Pete, when with a smash the hinges broke. Pete gave an exclamation, and the guard turned his head—only for a second, though, but that was enough, for I had been watching him, and it was no great thing to take advantage of the chance.

"Like a flash my arms had dropped, and those little 38-caliber pops were in my hands. With my right I dropped the guard, the bullet going through his head. I shot the fellow at the box with my left hand. I never was as good a shot with my left as with my right, and, in addition, he was three times as far away. So, instead of hitting him in the head, as I tried, I only got him in the body. As he turned and drew his gun I cried to the people to drop, for I knew there would be some lively shooting. I didn't take time to reach for my own gun, but threw myself on the dead robber, catching this bullet as I went down.

"I had the gun of the dead one up in a moment, and was able to kill Pete before any of the passengers were hit. I have kicked myself a hundred times when I remember my absolute lack of possession. It would have been just as easy for a man with presence of mind to have turned the trick with two shots, using the left on the close party, and saved the wound, but I couldn't think fast enough."—San Francisco Examiner.

A RED NOSE ARGUMENT.

An old gentlemen who was in trade in a Kennebec village for more than half a century used to relate an anecdote of a business rival who was a famous liquor seller in the days when "everybody kept it." The temperance agitation of 1844 had changed the notions of many persons in Maine as to the propriety of selling liquors, and at length the matter of for or against the traffic came up for a vote in town meeting.

The seller alluded to was very strenuous in his opposition to all restraint in his business, and labored heartily with the voters to resist the encroachment on their "rights." But in the course of the vote it became necessary to have a division of the house. All for the traffic went to one side of the room, all opposed to the other. The common use of alcoholic drinks had left its mark upon the faces of its victims, and the croud that assembled on one side of the town house to insist on their customary toddy was not so pretty as it might have been. To the surprise of every one, the famous old seller, after a moment's hesitation, deliberately went to the temperance side.

"What are you over here for?" the astonished people began to question. "You don't belong here. That's your side over there."

The old man looked around with disgust, and retorted:—

"You don't suppose I'm going over there in that crowd of red noses, do you?"

Curiously enough, a look at the uncanny assemblage of his customers and appalled him.

DETERIORATION.—"Yes," remarked Cholly to his tailor, "it's not a bad thing for you to have me among your patrons, you know." "Perhaps not," was the rather doubtful response. "My family name, being so well known in the community, is quite—ah—quite an advertisement foh you. My forefathers, as you are doubtless aware, were early settlers." "Yes; I've heard so. But I must say, sir, that in that respect you don't seem to take after them in the least."—Washington Star.

A SALVATION ARMY SKETCH.

men spoke his voice rolled forth in those rounded billows that in a rich diapason sing the mysteries of the deep.

"My friends," he said, "with God's help and the brigadier's consent"—which he never took the trouble to secure—"it seems too hard for this poor child to tell what happened to her in the gambling house at Butte that day. I was there when it happened and saw it all, and I will tell you the story. I can't bear to see her tortured as she has been this night. Cadet Annie Smith, take your seat."

He said that still without looking at her. With a glance at the brigadier, which meant, "How can I help it when this big thing shoulders me away?" she slipped behind the rose-embanken parlor organ and the embowered foliage plants on the stage and was lost to view.

The Brigadier sat watching the man with a peculiar expression, which no one could have understood had any one thought to observe it, but the stranger so completely filled all eyes and so impressed his masterly personality on the consciousness of all who could see and hear that nothing else could be observed. The stranger resumed:—

"I knowed the gambler that played it low down on this brave little Salvation Army lassie that day—knowed him well. He was a big, hulking dog that had skinned tenderfeet all the way between Puget Sound and Lake Michigan. He didn't know what it was to earn an honest living. He just sailed through life laughing at everything and skinning tenderfeet.

"He was running a faro game in the Montana joint when somebody left the door open and this little girl drifted in. The fellows wasn't used to the way she went after 'em. She just waded right in and tackled 'em, and them blue eyes that she carried in her head looked straight at 'em and through 'em as much as to say, 'I think you'd be a real decent fellow if you'd read the War Cry, quit gambling, quit drinking gin and have respect for the good women.' That's what the fellows told me her eyes said to 'em.

"Then the big gambler she started to tell you about comes up and she says to her: 'Hello, little Parson Sallie, what do you want?' 'I want to sell you a War Cry' she says. 'A what?' says he. 'A War Cry,' says he, and her calm blue eyes looked him through and through. 'A War Cry?' says she 'what's that?' and he knowed as well as she did what it was.

"After badgering her that way and not making her lose an inch of ground, he told her he'd make her a proposition by which she might sell him all the War Crys she had. The poor little thing listened to him, and her eyes got brighter and she asked him what the proposition was. He had her sit down at a card table, and took three cards—a king and two spot cards—and shuffled 'em on the table so that she could see the king while he was shuffling 'em, and then asked her if she could pick out the king as the three cards lay face down, alongside one another, on the table. She said of course she could. He says to her, "Try it.' She done so and of course she picked out the king.

"He says: 'That's smart, and I didn't think you could do it. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll shuffle the cards, and every time you pick out the king I'll buy two War Crys. Every time you pick out a spot card you are to give me a War Cry for nothing.' She agreed to that.

"The poor child didn't know that she was gambling—didn't know that she was tackling Montana Bill in his particular specialty, didn't know that she had run up against the slickest three-card monte thrower in the whole Northwest.

"Well, you know what happened. Bill cleaned the poor child out of every War Cry she had, and then laughed at her. I saw her as she sat there, and I saw how she looked when she began to realize that she had lost all her papers and didn't have a cent to show for 'em; I saw how white she got, and how she stared at Bill like he'd run a knife through her body; I saw how she got up and looked around at the laughing men, like a lamb cornered by a pack of wolves; I saw her try hard to keep back the tears, and then she says: 'Men, I will pray to God to lead you all into better lives.' And her voice was so choked that she couldn't say an more. Then she walked out slowly, and cried all the way up the street."

The big man paused, for his own voice had become unaccountably thick and had lost much of its rich, deep swing and resonance. But he soon regained his self-possession and then proceeded:—

"Montana Bill was a hard case, for sure, but he had a streak of manhood somewhere under his thick skin. The boys in the joint all thought it was a great joke on the little girl, and they laughed and shouted till they almost cracked the roof. But Bill didn't laugh. He stood silent and glum, with his hands in his pockets, looking out through the door. Then he went out, saying he had a game awaiting for him at Ike's saloon, and he went slouching up the street. The farther he got away from the joint the faster he walked, and then he done a sneaking thing—he looked back to see if any of the boys was following him. They wasn't, though, and then he let out them long legs of his for the liveliest walk he ever took in his life.

"He soon caught sight of her, and then he slowed up and followed. She was still crying and people would stop and wonder what was the matter, and some of 'em laughed. Bill got on to that, and it riled him through. He slapped one fellow clean into the middle of the street, and went right on without a word. I heard afterward that several people that he knew spoke to him, but he didn't see none of 'em, and kept right on.

"The girl went straight to the headquarters of the Salvation Army, and Bill followed her in. She went into a little office, where there didn't happen to be anybody else, and sat down and put her head on the table and cried like her heart was broke. For the first time in his life Montana Bill's nerve broke down. She looked so small and forlorn and miserable that if he hadn't been the man that done her up he'd a gone out and whipped the feller that did. And when he knowed that he was that identical scoundrel and that there wasn't anybody big enough or man enough to whip him, he felt just like a thoroughbred dog that had been caught sucking eggs.

"I want to say this for Bill. Bad as he was, he never meant to rob the girl. He was only having fun with her in the saloon, and he meant to give back the papers, but it was the way she acted in the saloon that made him forget. It was the pity that she showed for him and the little prayer she said that made him lose his head. And that was the first time in his life that Montana Bill ever lost his head.

"And so, when he saw her crying out her heart in the little office, she not knowing that anybody was about, he didn't have the nerve to own up like a man. He just sneaked a $20 gold piece on to the table and tried to steal out like a thief. But she heard him, and saw the money, and looked at him like he was a ghost, and sprung ahead of him and stopped him with a look he never seen in no mortal face in his life.

"'It was God who put it into your heart to follow me and bring that money,' she said to him, and as He has done that much, He has done more, and will keep on doing more until that big, manly heart in your body beats altogether for mankind and its redeemer.'"

The giant paused. His narrative had been so simple and earnest that there were tears in many eyes. Perhaps it was these that sent his self-mastery astray, for when he essayed speech again he failed. Then he looked so foolish and helpless that a suppressed titter ran through the audience, and this made it all the worse for him.

At this juncture the Brigadier stepped forth. A half merry, half whimsical expression lighted up his face as he gently pushed the giant into a platform seat facing the audience, and then said:—

"And so it was too hard for the poor little girl to be made to tell before all these people what happened to her in the Butte saloon that day, and so a great, strong man, seeing how small and cruelly tortured she was, would come forward as her knight and protector. He would show the strength that lies in the heart of a giant. He—"

But the audience, having already caught the point, and seeing how foolish and childish the giant looked as he sat facing them, with tears streaming down his cheeks, burst into great laughter and applause, with a "Hallelujah!" and a 'God bless the big man!" now and then.

This being the case," resumed the Brigadier, "we may now proceed to the more interesting business of the evening. Cadet Annie Smith!" he called.

Two sparkling blue eyes, shining like stars under the canopy of a quaint blue bonnet, emerged from behind the foliage. Two fresh young cheeks as deeply banked with pink and red roses as the organ itself accompanied the the eyes, and a trim little girlish figure, which owned the stars and roses, advanced timidly to the front. A smile and a nod from the Brigadier evoked activity in the collapsed giant, who sat on the platform like an awkward schoolboy, and he came and stood clumsily beside the girl; neither looked at the other.

"My friends," said the Brigadier, in a very gentle and reverential voice, "it has pleased God to place it in my power to unite in the holy bonds of matrimony two of the noblest hearts that ever beat in the service of the Saviour. One of these is Cadet Annie Smith, whom many of you know and love. The other is William Chatsworth Harvey, formerly known as Montana Bill."—San Francisco Call.

SPRINGFIELD.

July business exceeds that of any other July.

August sales will jump ahead—we are to make things move that way.

To begin with we are to make dress skirts for nothing.

You can go to the silk department, dress goods department, black or colored, select any material that sells from 50 cents a yard to $5 and have it made for nothing.

There's a big advantage to begin with—in the first place the large variety of materials—select your own linings, stiffenings, binding—we take measurements; send to New York to have skirts fashionably and well made—free of charge.

You'll wonder how we can do it. Well, in New York there are thousands of men tailors idle. We have made arrangements with a contractor of skirts made during the month of August for a low price.

It's a bold move, but one that economical women will avail themselves of.

Go to the silk and dress goods departments. Skirts made free.

Nell.

You're a kind woman, Nan! ay, kind and true!
God will be good to faithful folk like you!
You knew my Ned!
A better, kinder, lad never drew breath.
We loved each other true, and we were wed
In church, like some who took him to his death;
A lad as gentle as a lamb, but lost
His senses when he took a drop too much.

Drink did it all—drink made him mad when crossed—
He was a poor man, and they're hard on such.
O Nan! that night! that night!
When I was sitting in this very chair,
Watching and waiting in the candlelight,
And heard his foot come creaking up the stair,
And turned, and saw him standing yonder, white
And wild, with staring eyes and rumpled hair!
And when I caught his arm and called, in fright,
He pushed me, swore, and to the door he passed
To lock and bar it fast.
Then down he drops just like a lump of lead,
Holding his brow, shaking, and growing whiter,
And—Nan!—just then the light seemed growing brighter,
And I could see the hands that held his head,
All red! all bloody red!
What could I do but scream? He groaned to hear,
Jumped to his feet and gripped me by the wrist;
"Be still, or I shall kill thee, Nell!" he hissed.
And I was still, for fear.
"They're after me—I've knifed a man!" he said.
"Be still!—the drink—the drink did it!—he is dead!"

Then we grew still, dead still. I couldn't weep;
All I could do was to cling to Ned and hark.
And Ned was cold, cold, cold, as if asleep,
But breathing hard and deep,
The candle flickered out—the room grew dark—
And—Nan! although my heart was true and tried—
When all grew cold and dim,
I shuddered—not for fear of them outside,
But just afraid to be alone with him.
"Ned! Ned!" I whispered—and he moaned and shook,
But did not heed or look!
"Ned! Ned! speak, lad! tell me it is not true!"
At that he raised his head and looked so wild;
Then, with a stare that froze my blood, he threw
His arms around me, crying like a child,
And held me close—and not a word was spoken,
While I clung tighter to his heart, and pressed him,
And did not fear him, though my heart was broken.
But kissed his poor stained hands, and cried, and blessed him.

Then, Nan, the dreadful daylight, coming cold
With a sound o' falling rain—
When I could see his face, and it looked old,
Like the pinched face of one that dies in pain;
Well, though we heard folk stirring in the sun,
We never thought to hide away or run,
Until we heard those voices in the street,
That hurrying of feet,
And Ned leaped up, and knew that they had come.
"Run, Ned!" I cried, but he was deaf and dumb!
"Hide, Ned!" I screamed, and held him; "hide thee, man!"
He stared with bloodshot eyes, and hearkened, Nan!
And all the rest is like a dream—the sound
Of knocking at the door—
A rush of men—a struggle on the ground—
A mist—a tramp—a roar;
For when I got my senses back again,
The room was empty—and my head went round!

God help him! God will help him! Ay, no fear!
It was the drink, not Ned—he meant no wrong;
So kind! so good!—and I am useless here.
Now he is lost that loved me true and long.
· · · That night before he died;
I didn't cry—my heart was hard and dried;
But when the clocks went "one," I took my shawl
To cover up my face, and stole away,
And walked along the silent streets, where all
Looked cold and still and gray,
And on I went, and stood in Leicesters square,
But just as "three" was sounded close at hand
I started and turned east, before I knew,
Then down Saint Martin's lane, along the Strand,
And through the toll-gate on to Waterloo.

Some men and lads went by,
And turning round, I gazed, and watched 'em go,
Then felt that they were going to see him die,
And drew my shawl more tight, and followed slow.
More people passed me, a country cart with hay
Stopped close beside me, and two or three Talked about it. I moaned and crept away!

Next came a hollow sound I knew full well,
For something gripped me round the heart!—and then
There came the solemn tolling of a bell!
O God! O God! how could I sit close by,
And neither scream nor cry?
As if I had been stone, all hard and cold,
I listened, listened, listened, still and dumb,
While the folk murmured, and the death-bell tolled,
And the day brightened, and his time had come.
· · · Till—Nan!—all else was silent, but the knell
Of the slow bell!
And I could only wait, and wait, and wait,
And what I waited for I couldn't tell—
At last there come a groaning deep and great—
Saint Paul's struck "eight"—
I screamed, and seemed to turn to fire, and fell!

BERTIE MARTIN'S BLUES.

"Wish? Of course I will."

The house-party was gathered round the celebrated wishing-well in the old ruins, forming one of the most attractive features of the estate of Newton Chase, and trying the luck that with some certainty had been forward of late.

The speaker was a bright fresh girl of nineteen, Dorothy Manners, who, with her brother Tom, a cadet from Sandhurst, was paying her first grown-up visit for the Denley Bachelor's ball, and in the course of her stay had won the admiration of Captain Martin, known to his intimates as Bertie. And without betraying any of Dorothy's secrets we may allow that on the whole she thought him very nice. That Lady Newton (their hostess) saw this state of affairs with pleasure cannot be doubted; but whether the long invitation accorded to each was the result of intention or chance she did not divulge.

She had known Bertie Martin for several years, and he ranked as one of her favorites. The touch of cynicism that in unguarded moments he betrayed vexed while it puzzled her; and when on the death of a relative he was left with a comfortable little income, she, womanlike, felt it her duty if possible to remove the cloud of gloom that somehow of late had seemed habitual to him.

When, therefore, in the summer previous to the winter of which I am writing, she had during a visit to Devonshire, renewed an old acquaintanceship in the form of the Rev. Robert Manners and his wife, and conceived a great affection for their lovely daughter—presented with so much pride by her parents—Lady Newton may be forgiven, as the frank gray eyes were raised to hers and the merry laugh sounded in her ears, for feeling that if Dorothy could not assist in chasing away Bertie Martin's "blues," her knowledge of men was small.

And the man was, as men are, totally unconscious of the guidance of a "properly conducted" woman, and when it became apparent, as it soon did, that the girl's truthful face and happy ways had made an impression, Lady Newton heaved a sigh of content, left things to take their course and waited quietly.

But suddenly, to her unaccountably, a change came over the spirit of her dream; and it came with the advent of Lady Evelyn Sturtees, two days previous to the ball.

It was extraordinary. Gossip had never in the slightest connected their names; she knew sufficient of her world to know it would if it could, and then—Lady Evelyn was not that sort of a woman. True, clever men told you she was clever; fools, that she was sweet and gentle, with her lovely face and perfect ways; clever women said she was pretty, but "you know, dear, not a bit clever;" while silly ones declared they liked her, but they could not understand her. To her husband she was divine, and he spent most of his time in wondering how such a being could have condescended to marry him. She never quarreled, at least openly, and some men worshipped her, but from afar.

However, whatever she might be, the fact remained that with her arrival had departed Dorothy's happiness. Captain Martin had become constrained and distant, and instead of engrossing her every moment had left her to the society of his friend and brother officer, Captain Wemyss, contenting himself with the companionship of his own sex. What was the cause of it, wondered poor Lady Newton. Had they quarreled? She thought not—she rather hoped they had.

But during this digression we have left Dorothy sitting on the edge of the well, wishing, wishing with all her heart. Every one else had already done so in a really solemn manner, at the same time dropping a pebble into the clear depths. As the girl followed in her turn, she happened to glance at Captain Martin, who was watching her fixedly, as if to read her thoughts.

Her manner changed.

"I wonder," she asked, "if these wishes have ever come true?"

"Oh! some do, of course," replied Captain Wemyss, "in fact, I know a queer case in point, but I won't answer for the fulfilled wish bringing happiness. A fellow in our battalion was awfully fond of a girl, a Miss Saunderson—you remember her, Martin?" Bertie nodded, and he resumed: "The liking was mutual, she was quite a child; only sixteen, I fancy, and I knew her intimately. One day at a picnic we were all wishing, much the same as to-day, and afterward she came to me and said, 'I shall be such a happy girl if my wish comes true.' I laughed and said, 'Be sure to tell me if it does,' and she promised to do so. I was sent to the plains for a month the next day, and on my return I met her with all the smiles gone from her pretty little face. Poor soul, she sobbed out her grief to me; her father would not hear of an engagement, as he thought the man 'rather fast.' 'My wish did come true,' she said, 'for I hoped he would propose, and he did that afternoon; but what was the good of it?' He was killed shortly afterward in Afghanistan, and she was awfully cut up for a long time; but at last married a man of the name of Trevor. They live in London, and she and I have always been the best of friends."

"Are you not speaking of the Mrs. Trevor who is expected this afternoon?" inquired Lady Evelyn.

"Yes," he replied, "and you know the proverb, 'Speak of angels,' etc.; here she comes, with Lady Newton."

The party turned to greet her, for she was a general favorite, and Captain Martin advanced with outstretched hand:—

"I suppose you hardly remember me, Mrs. Trevor? It is several years since we met."

"I think I do," she replied, smiling pleasantly; are you not 'little Bertie Martin' that used to be? You had just joined when I first met you, and were devoted to polo; are you fond of it still?" and the talk drifted to other subjects until there was a proposal to explore the ruins, as a secret room had lately been discovered and Lady Newton was anxious to show it to the new arrival.

Most of the party had already disappeared, but Lady Evelyn remained seated. As Bertie was following, a voice stopped him, and he turned.

"Did you call, Lady Evelyn?"

"Yes, I did," she replied, "and of all the rude men you are the rudest. Don't you see that I don't want to explore, but that I want to be amused? Please leave the ruins alone, and stay here and chat with me."

"Most certainly," answered Bertie; "but I feel my powers in that direction are small, unless, unwittingly, I am lucky enough to afford you amusement, as I sometimes appear to do."

She took no notice of this remark, but looked at him steadily; surely no man could be quite insensible to the pretty picture she was making, in her soft, gray gown, with her fair hair and white skin against the winter landscape.

"I don't think India can be a very nice place, Bertie," she said at length, "for you have not improved since you went out. What a nice boy you used to be, too; so genuine, so pleasant, and now nothing but bitterness.

Bertie bit his lips. "I don't think we will refer to the past," said he, "although forgotten and unregretted things leave their track; and I suppose when once a man has had his faith in womankind destroyed it is hard to revive it.

"Faith in womankind destroyed!" she replied, laughing lightly; "why, you are getting quite heroic! Don't be so; it is quite out of date." Then, after a pause: "My dear Bertie, why will men never appreciate the little kindnesses we do them? There is nothing so beneficial as for a man to fall in love early and with a sensible woman. I don't wish to imply anything," laughing again, "but where would you be now if I had been a flirt, or equally allowed you to make love to me—to say nothing of what I owe to my old Jack? Think of the blasting of your fortunes, of your parents' dismay had you fallen across some penniless, pretty girl—for you, with your romantic disposition, would have gone down at once. Pray pardon the way I put it, but, mildly, you are a donkey, and don't know when you are well off!"

"You will pardon the way I put it also, Lady Evelyn," rejoined he, "but there is a refinement in flirtation that is more cruel and subtle than anything you can call by its name. It takes all you have to give, it saps your being, and then leaves you, as the world would say, with no reason to complain; but the more you value truth and refinement in woman, the more do you suffer by it."

"I really cannot follow you," murmured his companion, stifling a yawn, "you go so very deep, and I told you I want to be amused. You are none the worse for the deadly injury I wrought you," raising her eyebrows slightly, "so come down from the high horse, and be companionable. Do," she added coaxingly, and with the rare gift of which she had so large a portion drew the conversation back to pleasing topics, and they chatted merrily until they returned home.

Meanwhile Dorothy, escaping unseen, had made her way to her own little room, and there Tom, after vainly searching the garden for her, had found her an hour or two later.

"May I come in, Dolly? he asked gently, as he opened the door and cautiously peered into the room.

"Yes, dear," she replied; "come and sit down and talk to me."

Dolly was lying on the sofa in the firelight, which, shining on it now and then, revealed a tumbled head of brown fluffy hair, a sweet child's face, and eyes that for some reason, perhaps a headache, did not sparkle with their wonted luster.

The room was half in shade, so Tom, after stumbling over many pieces of furniture, made for the fireplace and stood in front of it.

"I didn't know you were seedy when we went to the well this afternoon," he commenced. "Lady Evelyn has promised to tell me if her wish comes true. And oh, Dolly," with a burst of enthusiasm, "what a rattling fine woman she is! She has given me three dances for this evening, and shan't I feel proud— I shall scarcely know if I am walking on solid ground; won't the other fellows envy me, that's all!"

"Yes, she is very pretty," said the girl, wearily.

"Pretty?" cried Tom; "lovely, you mean." Then, with a little conscious superiority: "I think she's a man's woman and, of course (with ire), you can't expect woman to admire them."

"No," said Dolly, in an amused tone; "I suppose not."

The boy sat silent for a few moments, but only for a few, when he rattled on. "By-the-by, have you quarreled with him?"

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE FROG'S PARTY.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER I.

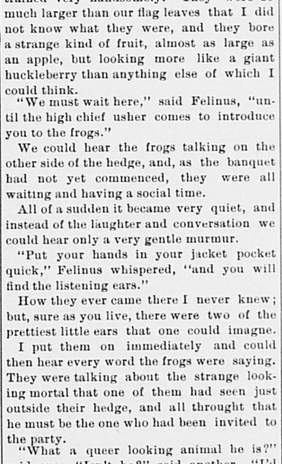
One day, when mother had sent me to pick berries, Felinus seemed especially happy.

Everybody had noticed that he would follow me as a dog follows his master, and they all thought this very strange for a cat, but as Felinus was a strange cat anyway my folks soon got used to his habit of following me to the pasture for berries or to the barn when I went to take care of the cattle.

As soon as we were fairly out of sight Felinus said, "There is a great event to happen in Fairyland to-day, and you are invited as special guest. King Jumpfar of Frog river is to give a royal banquet.

"Set your berry basket under these bushes and we will fill it later."

As soon as I was fairly seated on Felinus' back, he flew through the hill to Fairyland and we went miles and miles. Felinus



"We must wait here," said Felinus.

flew faster than I had ever known him to fly before, and he must have gone at least three miles a minute.

After flying past the queen's palace and the royal orange grove, we left the fig garden and the corn ball trees about a mile behind us and came down beside a clear, beautiful river.

Ferns, flag stalks and such plants usual with us grow where there is mud, and our frogs are fully as apt to live where there is mud as to choose a clean place for their home.

In Fairyland, however, the frogs are different. Instead of sitting on their hind legs with their fore feet on the ground they they walk erect like all well bred gentlemen and ladies, and nothing but extreme surprise or something which for a moment causes them to forget their usual good manners would cause any of the frogs to sit in the fashion that they usually follow here.

When it comes to jumping, however, they use all fours like any other frog. This was the way they usually go when in a special hurry.

While we were still some distance from the river we came to a hedge which was trimmed as nicely as any hedge you ever saw. It was composed principally of ferns about as high as a tall man's head and with very fine leaves. On the ferns grew a fruit about the size of an orange, but which looked more like a peach.

Among the ferns and arched in a graceful manner there were flag stalks. These grew as tall as a common apple tree, were planted in bunches and were trimmed and trained very handsomely. They were so much larger than our flag leaves that I did not know what they were, and they bore a strange kind of fruit, almost as large as an apple, but looking more like a giant huckleberry than anything else of which I could think.

"We must wait here," said Felinus, "until the high chief usher comes to introduce you to the frogs."

We could hear the frogs talking on the other side of the hedge, and, as the banquet had not yet commenced, they were all waiting and having a social time.

All of a sudden it became very quiet, and instead of the laughter and conversation we could hear only a very gentle murmur.

"Put your hands in your jacket pocket quick," Felinus whispered, "and you will find the listening ears."

How they ever came there I never knew; but, sure as you live, there were two of the prettiest little ears that one could imagine.

I put them on immediately and could then hear every word the frogs were saying. They were talking about the strange looking mortal that one of them had seen just outside their hedge, and all throught that he must be the one who had been invited to the party.

"What a queer looking animal he is?" said one. "Isn't he?" said another. "I'd just like to see him, as I've always heard how queer those mortals are and how strange they look," said a third.

"Is he one of those bad boys that throw stones at our outside neighbors?" spoke a small voice close to the hedge.

You see, by outside neighbors they meant the frogs that we have, and one of our kind had told his fairy acquaintances that the boys in our neighborhood used sometimes to throw stones at frogs.

"Take your listening ears out now," said Felinus. "It is not polite to try and hear that which is not intended for us, but it was best before you met the frogs that you should know how they regarded you."

"Now, the gates in their hedge were of grapevines, trained up on a cat-o'-nine tail trellis, and we had waited only a moment or two when one of the portals parted and out walked the high chief usher.

If it had been polite, you can be sure I should have laughed. Such a frog I had never seen.

He was as tall as a good sized man and was dressed in white rubber boots, which fitted as perfectly as the best kid glove that you ever saw. In fact, I did not know that he wore any boots at all, they fitted him so nicely.

On his hands were white rubber gloves, which reached to his elbows, and had nine gold buttons on each wrist.

His coat was one of the latest style for fairy frogs, and was very much like the old-fashioned dress coat which our grandfathers used to wear. It was made of a glossy material which I found later to be a tough kind of lily leaf.

"Unto the Hills."

O, restless heart, so full of cares,
Yet longing so for better things;
Impatient even in thy prayers,
And vexed at trifle happenings;
Receive the strength that calms and stills;
Lift up thine eyes "unto the hills."

They stand in silent majesty,
Clothed with the morning's pearl and rose;
Then soft white clouds about them lie,
And purple lights no valley knows;
Now by the sunshine they are kissed,
Now wrapped from sight in veils of mist.

Through summer heat, through winter snow,
Strong and immovable they stand;
The wild storm wind above them blows,
By gentle breezes they are fanned;
A thousand shifting shadows fall
Upon them; they remain through all.

Then, restless heart, take courage new;
Think of the things which shall abide;
The strength, unchangeable and true,
With which God's own are satisfied.
Thank him whose love his whole world fills,
And lift thine eyes "unto the hills."

PALMER HISTORY GLEANINGS.

BY O. P. ALLEN.

XV.

Palmer Carpet Manufacturing Company.

The manufacturing interest which has led up to the present enterprising company has had such a varied history that it may be well to put on record its inception and progress from the humble beginning half a century ago. In 1846 Mr. Horace Clark came here from Rutland, Mass., with a family of ten children, and located at Tenneyville. During the same year he bought the land of Azel Breckenridge, where the present carpet mill is located, built the dam which still remains, and put up a two-story mill, using the lower part for making heavy wagons and for sawing out material for Nehemiah Smith, wagon maker. The upper story was fitted with two cards and a picker for making cotton batting, of which 200 pounds were turned out per day. The product was sold in Springfield, Hartford and Boston. The upper story was burned in 1849, but replaced during the same year. Mr. Clark's sons, Edwin, George and Gardner, performed the work in the batting room. Mr. Clark operated this mill till about 1857, when he sold it to W. R. Parks.

At this point it may be stated that Dickenson Calkins built a one-story mill on King's brook, just above Azel Breckenridge's house, and leased it to Holt & Fairfield, who sawed marble slabs from the rough blocks and dressed the product for the public as wanted. They failed in business in 1850, when the mill was leased by W. R. Parks and W. C. Child, who bought quantities of cotton waste and converted it into cotton batting; after operating the mill for several years, they sold to Boliver Green, who continued the same for several years, when the mill came into Mr. Breckenridge's possession and was transformed into a saw mill for a season, and was then taken down.

Returning to the Clark mill, we learn that Mr. Parks continued the working of batting till 1861, when he went to Washington and bought a large quantity of cast-off soldiers' clothing, and having fitted up the mill with suitable machinery commenced the production of shoddy, for which he found a ready and profitable sale. In 1862 he changed the machinery and produced the filling for the tunic mill in Brimfield, which he had purchased and continued till about 1870, when the Park & Wade Carpet Co. was formed and the old Clark mill was again changed as to its machinery, and three looms put in for the production of Brussels carpeting. In 1871 Wade went out of the firm, and the Parks Carpet Co. was organized with a capital of $50,000. The mill was enlarged and fifteen looms put in. The next year the capital stock was increased to $150,000, and the mill enlarged to the capacity of thirty looms and nineteen put in, William Ingraham of Troy becoming president. The company met with an adverse fortune in 1873 and was obliged to suspend business, paying sixty cents on the dollar. In 1874 the Palmer Carpet Co. was organized with a capital of $50,000, the new company buying out the plant of the former one. Many Palmer people took stock in the new concern, but it did not prosper to that extent which the stockholders had hoped, so that when a convenient time came they were ready to dispose of their stock, which eventually became valuable as times improved. In 1887 W. C. Dewey bought a controling interest in the company, and became the manager of the property until another failure occurred in 1890. During the following year the present Palmer Carpet Manufacturing Co. was formed with a capital of $25,000. In 1892 Mr. M. J. Whittall of Worcester bought a controling interest in the company, and became its manager, with Mr. Andrew Pinney as superintendent.

A few years ago some changes were made, when all the original part of the mill was removed and new material substituted, so that nothing remains of the Clark mill or its belongings save the pond and dam, which has been excavated and enlarged, so as to supply the mill with sufficient water for scouring purposes, the power of the mill being a steam engine of 75-horse power. The present management has increased the capacity of the mill to twenty-four looms, which are producing an average of 6000 yards of body brussels per week. The product of the mill finds a ready sale from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and goes direct to the trade, without the intervention of middle men, this saving a nice profit for the company and avoiding the rocks on which the former companies split.

There are seventy operatives in the mill, with a pay roll of over $700 a week, most of whom find homes in three large tenement blocks owned by the company. We have every reason to hope that the carpet mill has become a staple institution of which our town can well be proud, for certainly the product of its looms is of the best, and commands the confidence of the trade far and wide.

HE HAS A BUSINESS HEAD.—He was a very small boy, and very ragged, but there was a look in his eyes of shrewd intelligence beyond his years. His left hand he held behind his back, but his right was extended, and between two grimy fingers he held a half-smoked stump of a cigarette. He had his eye on a well-dressed man who was walking jauntily along the street swinging his cane. "Say, mister," said the boy, "Gimme a match, will yer, please?" The man stopped good-naturedly, and smiled when he saw the dirty cigarette stump. He made a pretense of searching his pockets for a match, and finally said: "I haven't got one, bub." The boy hastily slipped the stump into his pocket and withdrawing his left hand from behind his back displayed a large box containing an assortment of small boxes. "If yer ain't got no matches," said he, "now's a good time fur yer ter buy. I got 'em all, wax and wood, an' some w'at won't blow out in the wind and udders w'at will. Yer takes yer pick." He sold two boxes for a nickel.—Philadelphia Record.

SPAIN has gone to offering rewards for information regarding fillibustering expeditions from the United States to Cuba, and President Cleveland has issued a proclamation calling upon all law-abiding citizens to refrain from joining in the same. Spain is willing to pay $10,000 per inform, but Cuba will keep on getting help from the same old source and Spain won't be compelled to negotiate a new loan with which to pay her rewards.

IT IS to be regretted that with the macadamizing of Thorndike street in the Depot village the grade of the street cannot be made what it should be, a true grade from Main street to Pine. But in order to do this a cut of a foot or more would have to be made in one place and a fill of several inches in another; the abutting property owners object, and the selectmen, while realizing the desirrbility of the change, naturally dislike to assume the resposibility of having it done.

AT THE meeting of the Massachusetts branch of the American Federation of Labor in Worcester on Tuesday, it was announced that the Federation would use its influence to defeat W. Murray Crane as a candidate for lieutenant governor, because Mr. Crane had prevented the union printers on the North Adams Transcript from securing their rights, but it seems that the Federation went off half-cocked, for the Transcript company announces that Mr. Crane does not and never has owned a dollar's worth of stock in the paper, and has never in any way controlled or had a voice in its management.

ADVOCATES of the "bloomer" costume for women cyclists will have a strong argument for their side in the accident which occurred in Springfield this week, when a young woman's skirt caught in her wheel, rendering it unmanageable and turning her into collision with a passing electric car, she being badly hurt. Had she been dressed in the rational costume, they will say, this could not have happened. That the "bloomer" costume is comfortable and convenient for the wearer there can be no doubt, but few of them can be called handsome or even attractive, and perhaps it is the almost absolute certain unfitness of the things which occasions so much remark against them.

CHARGES against Principal James C. Greenough of the Westfield normal school, amounting to a claim that he is not only not abreast of the times in advanced thought and methods, but that he is a drag to good work, have been made by the teachers of the school, several joining in the request for an investigation. The visitors have gone over the matter carefully and announce that the charges are not sustained by the evidence; that, even in the judgment of those making the charges, the work of the institution is excellent. With all this, there is evidently a lack of harmony at the school, and under the circumstances there is no lack of those who think the best interests of the commonwealth would be enhanced by Mr. Greenough's withdrawal.

THE horrible railroad accident near Atlantic City, N. J., on Thursday of last week made only too plain the fact that the best block system in the world is of no earthly use unless its signals are heeded by the engineer and the running orders of the road obeyed. In this instance an express train against which the signals were set, dashed into an excursion train which had the right of way, on a crossing. It was not customary to block an express train for a special, and when the engineer of the express found the distance signal set against him he deliberately disobeyed orders by running by at full speed; then when he found the crossing signal set against him could not stop his train, as he could have done had he had it under the control which his orders called for. The lives of the traveling public are largely in the hands of the engineer, and too great care cannot be exercised by them. The engineer who caused this wreck was one of the victims; unfortunately, his punishment was too soon ended.

NUMEROUS schemes for the redistricting of the county into representative districts were presented to the county commissioners at their meeting Tuesday, but they have not yet reached a decision. Only one person, Mr. Burr of Ludlow, presented a scheme which embraced the whole county, the other plans being confined to one or two pet districts in which the presentor was interested, the rest of the county not being considered. Col. Young of Springfield had everything in the east end of the county nicely arranged with the exception of Palmer, and when asked what was to be done with that town suggested that it be hung up on a nail. Monson, Brimfield and Wales were represented by delegations which protested against being put in the same district with Palmer, Monson being particularly emphatic in stating that whatever was done with that town it didn't wish to be connected with Palmer. The delegation had kindly provided for that town, however, by making it the tail of a kite composed of two wards of Chicopee and the town of Ludlow. What the new districts will be no one can guess, but it is possible that there may be some surprises when a decision is finally reached.

A WISE old Indian is reported to have once remarked: "White man fool me once, shame on him; fool me twice, shame on me." Intelligent men do not usually need to be taught a lesson twice, and with the experience of the past few years the voters of the town of Palmer may well think twice before voting to-morrow to put any material sum of money into the repair of the Three Rivers and Palmer schoolhouses. During the past five years about $3000 has been spent in repairs and alterations on the Three Rivers building; now nearly $300 more must be spent before it will be in suitable condition for use. In five years the voters have spent on this building very nearly as much as the interest on the cost of a new one,—comfortable, convenient and well-adapted in every way. How much longer they wish to keep on putting money into a building which the school committee says must soon be replaced with a new one, is for them to say, but no shrewd business man would conduct his private affairs in this manner. At the Depot village building about $400 must be expended in necessary repairs; the state inspectors require that a ventilating apparatus be put in, and the cost of this will be about $2600. Even after this is done there is a large probability that within five years a new building will be needed there. The JOURNAL suggests to the voters that they authorize the necessary repairs, passing over the balance of the matter until the annual meeting next March, when the report of the committee on the town debt will be made, which it is understood will cover the schoolhouse matter.

PALMER NEWS.

TWO PETTY BURGLARIES.

By Palmer Young Men, Who are Now Behind the Bars.

The fruit store of W. A. Barnes and the drug store of LeGro & Lynde were entered by burglars Sunday night and a small quantity of money and some cigarettes taken from the former, a few dollars and some note books from the latter. As a result of their longing for the property of other people two well-known Palmer young men, Fred J. Tuthill and Walter Goodes, are reflecting in Concord of the error of their way.

When Mr. Barnes came to his store Monday morning he found that a pane of glass in the window of the back door had been broken and the bar which fastened the door removed. An investigation showed that a quantity of cigarettes and between $5 and $7 in small change was missing. At LeGro & Lynde's an attempt had been made to enter by the rear door, but this proving unsuccessful a pane of glass in a Walnut street window was broken and the top sash lowered. Here about $6 in money and several note books were taken.

When the burglaries were made known the curiosity of all was aroused as to who the perpetrators were, but no one seemed to think they would be caught. Meanwhile the officers had a clew which they were working upon. Officer Eastman had seen two men about the streets in the vicinity of LeGro & Lynde's at a late hour Sunday night, and when he heard of the burglaries at once connected these men with them. With Officer Studley he went to work on the case, and at night the burglars were in the lockup. It was a surprise to all when it was learned that Tuthill and Goodes were the ones arrested. They appeared in court Tuesday morning charged with breaking and entering. Goodes pleaded guilty and Tuthill entered a plea of not guilty. A hearing was set for 2 o'clock in the afternoon. W. A. Barnes and C. A. LeGro told of the breaking into of their respective stores, and Mr. LeGro identified several of the note books found upon the persons of the defendants as belonging to his firm. Goodes was then put upon the stand and testified that with Tuthill he broke the glass in the rear of Barnes's store with a file, lifted the bar and entered the store and took cigarettes and money from the drawer. They then went to LeGro & Lynde's store and tried to gain entrance by the rear door but failed, then effected an entrance as described above. Tuthill entered and he remained on the watch outside. After this they went to the depot and took the 1 45 train for Springfield, where they remained until 7.45 in the morning, when they took the train for Bondsville, where they were arrested and brought to Palmer.

After Goodes had testified Tuthill said he wished to withdraw his plea of not guilty to breaking and entering and plead guilty to larceny. The court allowed this, and also accepted a plea of guilty of larceny instead of guilty of breaking and entering, in the case of Goodes. This brought the offense under the jurisdiction of the local court, and both were sent to the reform school at Concord, the length of their confinement to be determined by their behavior.

TO-MORROW'S TOWN MEETING.

What the Voters Will be Asked to Act Upon.

The special town meeting called for to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock will no doubt attract a large number of the voters, for important matters are to be acted upon, the principal one being that regarding the repair of the grammar school buildings in Three Rivers and the Depot village. The committee appointed to investigate the condition of the buildings will report that the one at Three Rivers can be repaired at a cost not exceeding $300, and that the actual sum will probably be less. Regarding the Depot village building they will recommend that necessary repairs, costing not over $400, be made, but will make no recommendation regarding the question of new ventilating apparatus. This they will leave to the voters. If it is put in it will cost about $2500.

Article four of the warrant, regarding improvements and sewer connections at the high school building, was inserted without the knowledge of the school committee, which says that it will have money enough for these changes without calling on the voters for more.

Article five, regarding the covering of the drain extending along Commercial street in the Depot village, is an important one. This drain extends for a considerable distance at the side of the street, and frequent complaint regarding the odors arising from it are made by those who have occasion to use the street. That it is a menace to the public health there can be no doubt, and it should have been attended to years ago. The nuisance can be remedied by building about 400 feet of 15-inch sewer between the foot of Walnut street and the foot of Thorndike street, which would carry all the sewage now emptying beside Commercial street. This will cost probably about $450, and it is understood that the selectmen have about $200 saved from the Main and Thorndike street sewer appropriation, which might be applied for this purpose.

The board of health was overlooked in the appropriation budget last spring, and an appropriation of $300 will be asked for now.

The sum of $1300 was appropriated in March for new bridges in Bondsville and Thorndike, but has not proved sufficient. The town has an unused iron bridge across the river at Bondsville, and it is suggested that this bridge be taken up and placed over the canal at Thorndike. About $200 additional will be required for this purpose.

Two suits have been brought against the town, one by Mr. Coleman of Three Rivers for damage caused by sewage, and the other by the parents of the boy recently killed by the fall of the bridge in Three Rivers while undergoing repairs, and the selectmen wish to know what to do regarding them.

Successful Liquor Raid in Holland.

Several weeks ago Sheriff Studley had his attention called to the fact that according to all appearances Henry Leno of Holland was engaged in illegal liquor selling. Mr. Leno's place is located between Holland and Stafford, near the Connecticut line. Saturday night Sheriff Studley, with Sheriff Lombard of Springfield, left to call upon Mr. Leno. They arrived at their destination about 2 o'clock Sunday morning and at once proceeded to make themselves at home. Mr. Studley when upon such visits has the habit of noticing things which are about the house, and his eyes fell upon several bottles of liquor, which he seized. Other things which he saw led him to believe that the suspicions of the citizens of Holland were not groundless, and Mr. Leno was arrested and brought to Palmer. He appeared in court Monday morning and in answer to the charge of keeping a common nuisance pleaded not guilty. His case was continued until Aug. 17.

He was on his way to Philadelphia, but his name could not be learned.

During the months of May, June and July of last year, under license, there were 47 arrests for drunkenness, and during the same months of this year, under no license, only 17 have been arrested. Not one of these obtained their liquor in Palmer; 12 of the "jags" were acquired in Monson, the others in Belchertown and Springfield.

The new grade for Thorndike street has been staked out, and work on grading will be begun to-morrow. The selectmen have been promised the road roller next Monday, and expect to have it at work on the street Tuesday. A coating of macadam eight inches thick will be put on in the center of the street, and six inches thick at the sides.

The Central Vermont railroad will run an excursion to Watch Hill Saturday, August 15, under the auspices of the Willimantic Christian Endeavor Union. The train will leave Palmer at 7.35 a. m. and Monson at 7.42. The return boat leaves Watch Hill at 3.30 p. m., connecting at New London with the train for Palmer and way stations. The fare for the round trip is $1.25.

Sig. Sautelle's circus exhibited here on the lot above the cemetery Saturday afternoon and evening. Both performances drew good sized crowds. The show made a favorable impression upon the public, and when Sig. Sautelle, or the "old rascal," as he calls himself, brings his show to Palmer again, it will be largely attended. The bareback riding and wire performance were worthy of special mention.

Business has been rather dull at the district court the past few weeks, but Monday morning two drunks, George Hinet and Thomas McCarthy, of Palmer, greeted the appearance of Judge Robinson. They were arrested by Officer Eastman Saturday evening on Knox street, when they resisted the officer and gave him quite a tussle, but were finally lodged in the lockup. Hinet was fined $5, which he paid. McCarthy was fined $10 for drunkenness and his case for assault on an officer was continued for six months.

C. W. Johnson had a black mare severely hurt at the epileptic hospital Tuesday afternoon. The animal was hitched to a tree and in some way got loose and started to run. At the end of the driveway, just before reaching the main road, she collided with a team which was hauling brick. The pole struck the colt in the breast and tore an ugly wound, laying a large piece of skin and flesh back. The pole of the wagon broke, or the end would probably have penetrated deep into the colt's flesh and probably proved fatal. The animal is getting along nicely.

Dr. Eaton and James Dewey, of Palmer, while sailing at Crystal Lake Sunday, were tipped over near Baker's camp. Dewey went out of the boat into water up to his waist. The most peculiar thing about the occurrence is the fact that Eaton did not get wet very much. A moment after the accident he was sitting on the bottom of the boat which had turned completely over. Another moment and he had turned the boat right side up, and was finding fault because his feet and ankles were wet. The boys went ashore, and it was several hours before they were sufficiently dry to return.—Stafford Press.

A clambake was served in Mr. Cheney's Riverside Grove last Saturday, about 16 being present; a good time was reported by all who attended. After all had had their fill of clams—and it took a great many to fill some—a ball game was in order. The winning side was fortunate enough to have with them ex-pitcher Anderson, of some unknown league. He has a peculiar was of pitching a ball, and but few of the players could tell in what direction the ball came from until it had gone over the plate three times in succession and the batter was declared out. After the ball game lemonade was served in what some of the players considered sparing quantities, out of regard for the maker, who it is understood needs considerable time for its concoction.

Shumway—Kempton.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Shumway was the scene of a very pretty wedding Tuesday at noon, when their daughter, Ora Luella, was married to Charles Marshall Kempton of Palmer. The bride is a very popular young lady of this town, a graduate of the Palmer high school class of '95, and the groom is well known in Palmer, being the son of Mrs. Fred Thompson, and is employed as bookkeeper in the Central Street Market.

The house and lawn were tastily decorated with ferns, asparagus, sweet peas, golden-rod and potted plants. The ceremony took place on the lawn under a canopy which was decorated with ferns and golden-rod. The bridal party formed in the house, and proceeded to the lawn while the bridal song was being played by Miss Ora Parent. The groom and his brother, Ezra Kempton, who was groomsman, took their place under an arch of maiden-hair fern and sweet peas, where they were joined by the rest of the bridal party. Miss Grace Thompson, the groom's little sister, came first as flower girl. She was followed by the ushers, Ralph LeGro and Robert Studley of Palmer. Next came Miss Lillian Kempton, the maid of honor, and after her the bridesmaids, Misses Florence Bond of Bondsville and Mignon Fuller of Palmer. The bride came last, leaning on the arm of her father. The ceremony was performed with a ring by Rev. F. J. Hale of Holyoke. Immediately after the ceremony refreshments were served to the guests on the lawn.

The bride wore a gown of white silk crepe and lace, and a broach of pearls which was the gift of the groom, and carried 20 bride roses. The flower-girl wore white silk mull over pink, and carried a basket of sweet peas. The maid of honor wore white crepe-de-chene with pearl trimmings, and the bridesmaids wore pink.

Nearly a hundred relatives and friends witnessed the ceremony, and among those present were Hubert Sedgwick of New Haven, Mr. and Mrs. T. D. Potter, Mrs. A. W. Little and Mr. M. J. Stevens of Springfield, D. W. Morey of North Wilbraham, A. W. Shumway of Old Hadley, D. F. Shumway and family, R. K. Shumway and family, C. R. Randall and family of Belchertown, Charles F. Orcutt and Mrs. Bradway of Monson. Among the many useful and valuable gifts were a silver service, dining table and chairs, clock, lamp and pictures.

Mr. and Mrs. Kempton took the 1.40 train at Palmer for Mount Vernon, Maine, where they will remain about two weeks, and will be at home in Palmer to their friends after October first.

When the Boston Journal joined the Associated Press, the strongest news gathering agency in the world, its readers probably recognized the immense gains in the news service received by them. Another improvement has just been added by the Journal, which is untiring in its efforts to give its readers the very best possible. An alliance has been formed with four of the leading papers of principal cities—the Chicago Tribune, the Philadelphia Press, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Cincinnati Commercial-Tribune—and as a result in each city special correspondents will attend exclusively to the service of the Journal, having full access to the "copy" in the offices of the papers mentioned. They will telegraph that news to the Journal, so that its readers will have the exclusive use of that service in New England. Combining this service with the admirable New York service which the Journal has for some time enjoyed, there is no question that in quality and in quantity the Journal will easily lead every paper in New England.

NEIGHBORHOOD NOTES.

MONSON.

The King's Daughters Reception to Miss Mattie Collis.

The South Circle gave the retiring president of the King's Daughters, Miss Mattie Collis, a reception yesterday afternoon at the house of her sister, Mrs. Willard Nelson. There were a large number present, and the occasion was a very pleasant one. Miss Collis has labored with much zeal for the prosperity of the order, and her efforts have been crowned with success. Not only have the poor and the sick of the town received attention from the order, but a young lady has been educated at Northfield for missionary work during the years Miss Collis has been president. The formal exercises of yesterday's reception consisted of singing, the reading by Mrs. Justin G. Caren, the secretary and treasurer, of the following letter:

To the South Circle of King's Daughters.

DEAR FRIENDS:—A few short weeks have passed away since the resignation of our president, Miss M. M. Collis, was received. Regrets came from all sides; we felt that we could not have it so. And soon the cry was What shall we do? It seemed as if the chain which had linked us together so long was then broken; for had we not, long years ago, learned to love the sunny face and to listen to the sweet voice of the dear sister who had labored so faithfully "In His Name." Under her gentle influence, we as a circle have been enabled to perform many deeds of kindness 'and sow the seed with willing hands,' ever remembering that there are lonely hearts to cherish as each day passed by.

Our dear sister is with us to-day wearing the little cross and trying to follow in the footsteps of our Heavenly King. To her we shall still look for counsel and advice, and by so doing show the love and esteem in which she will ever be held by our circle; at the same time remembering the rest she needs.

"He knoweth the longing wish of the heart,
Of the hopes and desires that upward start."

And to-day may we be bound together by a closer bond of sympathy than ever before, and when our dear sister's work on earth is done and the little cross shall be laid down, may it be to receive the 'Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' Yours, 'In His Name.'"

This was followed by the reading of this poem, written for the occasion by Clarissa Starks Thompson:

Dear friends, we have met on this fair summer day,
Our tributes of fondest affection to pay
To the one who has been for many a year
The head of the circle we all hold so dear.
Eight times have we seen the June roses unfold,
Eight times have the leaves turned to crimson and gold
Since into existence our little band came,
With its emblem, the cross, which we wear "In His name."
Small was our number, but love made us strong,
And our "valley of shadow" heard many a song.
Albeit the treasurer's brow often wore
A furrow of care as she counted our store
And saw that our funds had vanished like dew,
Till even the coppers began to be few.
But He who considers the lilies that grow,
And gives to the sunset its radiant glow,
Much more shall hear even the faintest of cries
That His suffering children send up to the skies;
And when our petitions went up to the throne
We found that the Father watched over His own,
For the help that we craved from His hand was supplied,
And we proved the glad truth that the "Lord will provide."
Our mission has been to give aid to the poor,
And care for the stranger who came to our door;
While where'r the sick and the sorrowful dwelt,
Our true-hearted sisters have lovingly knelt
And prayed that the "Angel of Patience" might bring
A message of joy from our Father and King.
There are changes we find in our circle each year,
New names dot our record—new faces appear;
While many who walked by our side in the past,
Are beholding the "King in His beauty" at last.
And you, well-loved sister, our leader and friend,
On whom in our need we could always depend
For the sweet word of comfort, the clasp of the hand
That made you so dear to each one of our band—
Till our hearts cease to beat, till each life sun has set,
Your loyal devotion not one will forget.
The tributes we bring you to-day are your due—
'T is the fruit of the vine that was planted by you.
Whate'er the years bring us, wherever we dwell,
You will live in the hearts that have loved you so well;
Till we meet you one day in that bright world above,
Where, united at last with an infinite love,
In the Heavenly choir our glad voices will ring,
And we'll go out no more from the courts of the King.

In behalf of the circle, Mrs. William H. Marble presented, in a few well-chosen words, a Bible, and Miss Collis feelingly responded. After this the company repeated the 13th chapter of Corinthians, Miss Collis leading. The Lord's prayer and singing closed the exercises. The company then repaired to the lawn, and ice cream, cake and lemonade were served.

Monsons 19—Wares 10.

The ball game between Ware and Monson last Saturday resulted in a victory for the home team by a score of 19 to 10. There were 500 people on the grounds, and perfect order was maintained. Manager Cuddihy had the grounds roped off so that the crowd could not interfere with the game, and every one could see in consequence. The work of Davis and Kearns in the box was good, Kearns receiving the better support. The playing of Silver at first for the Monsons was gilt-edged. Sullivan's play at third would have lost a closely contested game. The batting of Curley and Coughlin for the home team and Wenn for the visitors, and the base running of Silver were features. The work of Brown at first for the visitors was poor. Appended is a patial summary:

Shaw, Springfield, $735.50; William Orlando, Belchertown, $556.65; T. D. Potter, Bondsville, $544 67. Thomas O'Connor also put in a bid of $5 less than the lowest bidder. At the end of William Orlando's bid was a statement saying that he would do the work for $10 less than the lowest bidder, and the contract was given to him for $534.67, $10 less than the bid of T. D. Potter, which was the lowest bona fide bid. The citizens of South Belchertown are greatly dissatisfied with the manner in which the contract was given, and think that it should have gone to T. D. Potter of Bondsville.

Ramsdell—Faulkner.

Miss Jennie M. Ramsdell, oldest daughter of William B. Ramsdell, and George M. Faulkner were married Tuesday evening at the home of the bride's parents. Only the relatives and a few friends were present. Rev. Harvey J. Paine of Clinton, a cousin of the bride, performed the ceremony. The bride was attired in white satin, and was attended by two bridesmaids, Miss Dorothy Faulker, daughter of the groom, and Miss Flossie Crosby. The house was very prettily decorated with maiden-hair ferns and golden-rod principally. After the ceremony Caterer Frank Keith served very nice refreshments. The presents were numerous and handsome. Guests were present from New York, Holyoke, Princeton, Worcester and elsewhere. Mr. and Mrs. Faulkner took the late train for Boston, whence they plan to take a ten-days' trip to the White Mountains, Montreal and Quebec. On their return they will occupy the new house recently built by E. L. Foskit on Elm street.

A Successful Robbery.

One of the boldest robberies committed in this town for many years occurred last Friday, when the house of John G. Leach on Southbridge street was entered in the afternoon between the hours of 2 and 5.30. No one was in the house at the time. Mrs. Leach and her daughter-in-law were absent during the afternoon, and on their return it was found that an entrance had been made by a back window and the house ransacked. The window at which the burglars enteredwas shaded by a large tree, and although it was some distance from the ground was easily entered, as a screen had been left in it. The burglars secured four watches, one very valuable, a revolver, razor and other things, besides over $300 in money. Of the latter about $10 was in pennies and $20 in dimes. Sheriff Putnam arrested a stranger giving his name as Adams of Springfield on suspicion, but as there was no evidence against him he was discharged. The police have no definite clew to work on, and in all probability the thief or thieves will never be caught.

The same afternoon an entrance was gained in C. S. Johnson's house on the West Brookfield road, but nothing of value was taken. It is probable that Harlow P. Bliss's house was entered at the same time, though the loss of his watch was not discovered until Sunday morning. At Mr. Bliss's house they entered the apartments of Mr. John Mitchell and took a valuable pipe, but did not find any watches or money.

Monday night the same or other miscreants stole two cacti from Mrs. M. D. Bliss's piazza and also removed two callas from E. P. Tucker's.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Mr. G. Cailloutte, druggist, Beaversville, Ill., says: "To Dr. King's New Discovery I owe my life. Was taken with la grippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail, and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. Won't keep store or house without it." Get a free trial of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle, and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. Wm. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Since 1878 there have been nine epidemics of dysentery in different parts of the country in which Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy was used with perfect success. Dysentery, when epidemic, is almost as severe and dangerous as Asiatic cholera. Heretofore the best efforts of the most skilled physicians have failed to check its ravages; this remedy, however, has cured the most malignant cases, both of children and adults, and under the most trying conditions, which proves it to be the best medicine in the world for bowel complaints. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Always in season, Hopkins' Steamed Hominy (Hulled Corn). Elegant lunch in milk. Qt. can, 10c.

My little boy, when two years of age, was taken very ill with bloody flux. I was advised to use Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and luckily procured part of a bottle. I care fully read the directions and gave it accordingly. He was very low, but slowly and surely he began to improve, gradually recovered, and is now as stout and strong as ever. I feel sure it saved his life. I never can praise the Remedy half its worth. I am sorry every one in the world does not know how good it is, as I do.—Mrs. Linda S. Hinton, Grahamsville, Marion Co., Florida. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

A LINE OF Kennedy's Sweet Goods,

Go into the best Grocery Stores in any city—the stores that have the most intelligent trade—and ask them what is best for washing and cleaning. They'll tell you, "Pearline." Ask them how the imitations compare with it, in quality and in sales. They'll tell you that they're far behind. What does this show? Why, that the people who have the finest and most delicate things to wash, and who would be least likely to risk these things with any dangerous washing compound—it shows that these people have proved to themselves that Pearline is the best. And it certainly is. 442

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

When the high chief usher saw Felinus he very politely stood on one foot and waved the opposite hand. Felinus in return, stood on his hind feet and clapped his fore paws together twice. This form of salute would mean in language, "We greet you with pleasure and hope your appetite is good."

You see in Fairyland they don't have sickness, but when they give a great feast at a wedding or on any such occasion it is always hoped that the guests will bring their best manners and their best appetites to do it honor.

Now, as you know, having been through the animal fountain, I could understand all this perfectly, and so I replied to the frog's greeting by standing on my right foot, taking my left foot in my left hand and waving my right arm three times. This meant, "Ladies and gentleman, I am very glad to be present with you on this happy occasion, and assure you that a healthy growing boy always has a good appetite. What have you good to eat?"

This in sign conversation was a very long speech, and Felinus looked very proud to have brought a guest who knew how to behave himself so well under such new and strange conditions. He had told me on the way, however, all about it, but had been afraid that I would forget or be too bashful to make the proper reply.

The high chief usher then offered us each an arm, and we walked through the opening in the hedge.

On the bank between the river and the hedge there were large frogs and small frogs, and even the pollywogs, which you know are frog babies, and which are not allowed to leave the river, had come in the water as near the shore as they could get. All were in line, and all were looking to see the wonderful strange animal, the mortal boy who had been invited to attend the banquet.

The high chief usher then offered us each an arm.

I felt so bashful that Felinus rubbed his head against my hand and whispered that the king was coming and I must behave my very best, and just then, at the end of the line, I saw King Jumpfar and the queen.

The king's robe was of royal purple striped like the blue flag lilies, and his crown was set with wonderful pearls in all colors of the rainbow.

"Felinus, Marquis of Flying Cat Corners, and the magically initiated Boy Mortal," croaked the high chief usher, and Felinus and I marched down the line alone. I kissed the queen's right hand, and Felinus bowed low to the king. I had just time to see that all the frogs and frogesses behind us had formed a procession, two by two, when suddenly from down by the river edge there came the sound of music.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

THE BRIDGE OF AN OCEAN LINER.

Let us spend an hour with Capt Randle of the American liner St. Louis on the bridge in mid-ocean. He first takes us into the wheel-house. It is a room about 10 feet wide with a curved front. A wheel about three feet in diameter is placed in the center of the room, and you are surprised to see that the quartermaster keeps turning it almost constantly. You have always thought that he had simply to keep his eye on the floating compass in the box directly in front of him and hold the ship steady on her course. As you look at the compass you see the ship veering now this way and now that as she rolls and plunges, or as one screw turns faster than the other, and thus pulls the ship around. It is hard to make two independent screws go exactly at the same speed, and so this man at the wheel is busy all the time turning the ship straight. He has to fight the waves and the screws and the winds at the same time, and he is a busy man.

This steering-wheel controls the ship by means of a small column of oil in a little tube. By turning the wheel this way or that the oil in the tube is forced up or down, and that opens or closes certain valves in the steam steering-gear 400 feet away, and the rudder is turned as easily as if a child had done it. In most steamships the steam steering-gear is controlled by hydraulic power—that is, by water—but the use of a column of oil is an improvement.

As you look about, you see fastened to the cornice directly in front of the wheelman a little scale in black with white lines marked off on it. There is a dial on it, and as the ship rolls you see that this is a device to mark the degree of the roll. You may notice that it takes about a second for every degree of a roll. On each side of the room is another long black gauge, and the dials point to certain figures, generally between 90 and 65. These dials are little electrical devices, showing exactly how many revolutions the screws are making. The captain at a glance knows what is going on in the engine-rooms.

Over in the corner of the room is another curious electrical device. It is a little box with a clock in it. The captain tells you it is the machine that controls the whistle in time of fog. The law requires a long blast of the whistle at such times every two minutes. By pressing a button on this little clock apparatus, and by setting the clock in a certain manner, the whistle is blown automatically for seven seconds every minute. There can be no error of man in that work. Just as sure as every minute comes around that whistle will blow seven seconds. Under the old way, when a man pulled the whistle cord, there was no exactness in the work. When the fog is over the button is released, and the whistle stops.—From Harper's Round Table.

The foxy boy applied for a job. "Do you want a boy?" he asked of the magnate of the office, standing before him cap in hand." "Nobody wants a boy," replied the magnate, eyeing him sharply. "Do you need a boy?" asked the applicant, nowise abashed. "Nobody needs a boy," came the discouraging reply. The boy stuck his cap on the back of his head. "Well, say, mister," he inquired, "do you have to have a boy?" The magnate collapsed. "I'm sorry to say we do," he said, "and I guess you're about what we want."—Detroit Free Press.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

HAD THE SAME VACANT LOOK.—Joseph H. Choate seldom meets a successful antagonist in repartee, but he met his match while trying a case in the surrogate's court not long ago. An old woman was being questioned about how a certain testator had looked when a certain incident had occurred. "Now, how can I remember? He's been dead two years," she replied testily. "Is your memory so poor that you can't remember two years back?" continued Choate. The old woman was silent and Choate asked: "Did he look anything like me?" "Seems to me he did have the same sort of a vacant look!" snapped the witness. The questioning was suspended.—New York Mail and Express.

BERTIE MARTIN'S BLUES.

"Quarreled with whom?" returned the girl, sharply.

"Martin," said Tom. "You used to be always together, and for the last day or two you have scarcely spoken to him."

At this moment the firelight flickered over Dolly's face, showing an expression of such suffering upon it that the boy was startled. "Are you in such pain, Dolly?" he inquired.

"Terrible," she murmured: but the next moment was sorry she had spoken, for Tom had marched to her dressing-table, again stumbling over half the furniture; she heard him strike a match, and in a few moments he was back at her side with a tumbler filled with eau de cologne and water in one hand and two or three handkerchiefs in the other. He perched himself on the arm of the sofa, and commenced laying wet rags upon her forehead. He was moving one preparatory to supply its place, when something struck him, and he peered suspiciously into her face.

"Dolly," he whispered, gently, "is anything the matter, dear? What have you been crying about?"

"I crying?" with a forced laugh; "don't talk such nonsense; I have such a headache, so cover my eyes up quickly, like a kind boy. It's done it a great deal of good," she added, gratefully.

So Tom said no more, but shook his head, and perhaps more gently than before, changed the cloths, and fanned her until the dressing gong sounded. Then, with protestations that the headache was completely gone, she dismissed him to dress, telling him he would never be ready in time.

At this moment Lady Evelyn's words, "You are none the worse for the injury," with their mocking sound, were ringing in Bertie Martin's ears as he ascended the stairs to his room. Was he indeed none the worse? When eight years previously he had met Lady Evelyn, and in the full enthusiasm of youth, infatuated with her beauty, had poured at her feet his fresh, full homage, giving all, but asking nothing (the boy's worship that is so soon got over!) he was met, not with the quiet repression that would have put her in the right for always, and raised her above all women, but the quiet amusement, the light laugh the "shocking, shocking!" that had stung him to the quick, and sent him from her presence man instead of boy. From henceforth he was a woman's enemy, albeit his gentle and courteous manner to their sex.

When three weeks ago he met Dorothy Manners for the first time, almost from the first day his heart had gone out to her in her simplicity and sweetness. She had well-nigh restored the trust that had been so crushed and broken, that is so essential to the character of a strong man. He had decided to put his fate to the touch at that evening's ball, as his visit was ended the next morning, when he was leaving Newton Chase. But the appearance on the scene of Lady Evelyn two days prior to that event had changed everything. The very sight of her had reopened the old wound of distrust and unbelief, and with no consideration for Dolly or her feeling, he had purposely avoided her, determining to keep many miles between them in the future.

Perhaps had he known that with all her brave appearance the curly head was pressed tight into the pillow in the solitude of the night, and a storm of sobs shook the wee frame as she asked herself again and again what had she done? how had she offended? he would not have judged all from the same standpoint.

The gong sounding in the midst of his reflections awoke him to the knowledge that his dressing was in a backward state. There was nothing for it but to complete his toilet as quickly as possible, and descend to the drawing-room, with many apologies for his late appearance. "Don't mention it, my dear fellow," said his host, patting his shoulder, "we have all had to be so careful this evening; you are nothing to Tom, who has posed before his glass for two hours at least, and has to finish afterward." And Tom, who was attired in a very high collar, smiled as cheerfully as that instrument would allow him to do.

Dorothy was looking her very prettiest, her cheeks flushed with color, and she was laughing and talking as merrily as if her course of love were running very smooth. At all events, she would not wear the willow for any one. But, oh dear! how she had looked forward to this ball, scratching off the days in her calendar as they went by; and now—well, she would enjoy it all the same.

When they came down cloaked for the carriages they occupied the spare time in filling up the programmes. Bertie found it impossible to keep his eyes steadily from one point of the room; he was obliged by common courtesy to dance with the guests in the house, so he made his way to Dorothy's side, who was laughing over some joke with Captain Wemyss (and now that he thought of it, that gentleman had been slightly stiff in manner all day), to ask for a dance.

"Certainly," the girl replied in a friendly tone; "will you have a square or round?"

Now why men should consider it an insult to be offered a square is to me a mystery, but the fact remains that they do, so Bertie's chin went a few inches higher in the air as he replied:—

"Round, if you have no objection, and may I have two?"

"Be careful of your dances, Dolly, please," said Lady Newton, who was passing at the moment; "I am answerable for a good many with you this evening."

That lady had a wise head on a pair of very small shoulders, and did not approve in the very least of the way in which her pretty favorite was being treated, and she felt certain that with a little help the girl could hold her own.

It was pointing to 10.30 o'clock when the party entered the ballroom, and were soon enjoying themselves as much as a perfect floor, brilliant music and pleasant partners can make them.

Bertie's first dance with Dolly was over. She had been very entertaining, chatting merrily over the assembled company, as if it were only an evening's acquaintance, seeming oblivious of anything that might have been. He was decidedly piqued, and determined to leave early the next day, so his replies to her sallies were stiff and laconic.

As a fresh dance struck up, he remembered that he was engaged for it to Mrs. Trevor, and he was glad of it, for just then he could talk better of years ago in India than of the present time.

"Will you sit it out?" he asked, as he claimed her; "the room has become so warm."

"Certainly," she acquiesced, "and I am a little tired, too."

So he found her a nice nook where he settled her comfortably, and then sank into a seat by her side.

"I was so pleased to see you this evening," she said, "I had no idea I was to meet you; you little know what a treat it is to me to meet people I knew as a girl, for I am literally without any relatives, as my dear old father died shortly after my marriage. You must come and see us on your return to town. I have three babies, so you will have to make their acquaintance."

They talked of many things and many people, until at last Bertie touched on the name of her lover of years gone by.

"You remember him?" he asked.

"Yes," she answered softly, "we saw by the papers that he fell at the storming of Candahar; you were his great friend, I remember that."

"I was with him at the end," he said; hesitated, and then continued: "His last words were a message, which I promised to deliver should I ever have a chance; and now after years the opportunity has come."

"Hush!" she murmured, as she raised her face and he saw her eyes were misty; do not tell me; I do not wish to hear it."

"But, but, Mrs. Trevor," stammered Bertie, amazed, "he is dead; he died six years ago; it cannot matter now."

"No, no, of course not, I know that," she said, and as she laid her hand upon his arm a little sob ran through her laugh, as she continued: "You know I have old-fashioned notions; my friends tell me it is one of my worst faults, but you must forgive it. My husband is very dear to me, so—so—I cannot let him have a rival, even in the thought of one so long passed away. But come, Captain Martin," with a change of tone, "you will be thinking me quite sentimental, and I don't wish to get back into the black looks of your other partners," laughing. "If I am not mistaked, I hear the opening bars of a waltz."

Without a word he led her to the ballroom, and with a very gentle smile and a look she never forgot he left her.

With Dolly was his next dance, with Dolly were all his thoughts, and he felt as if he were walking on air. The long-remembered distrust was dead forever; killed more powerfully by the old-fashioned words of the woman he had just quitted than by any means that even Dolly could have devised.

And she? The night was fast wearing away, the night that had now no background, and her heart felt sick with pain as she saw him cross the room to her side. She was brave, but still she could not summon a smile as she dismissed her partner; so gently, without a word, took his arm for his last dance.

"You do not want to dance this; will you come out?" Bertie asked. But as she raised her eyes to his and hesitated, he said quite humbly: "I want to ask you something, Dolly dear; do come."—The Argosy.

is nearly here; that means a bargainfest to Clothing, Furnishing and Hat buyers. There's always an accumulation of odds and ends at the end of a season's business. Can't help it. Sizes are mostly 33, 34, 35, 39, 40, 42 and 44.

The Two Glasses.

There sat two glasses filled to the brim,
On a rich man's table, rim to rim;
One was ruddy and red as blood,
And one was clear as the crystal flood.
Said the glass of wine to the paler brother,
"Let us tell of the past to each other;
I can tell of banquet and revel and mirth,
And the proudest and grandest souls on earth
Fell under my touch as though struck by the blight,
Where I was king, for I ruled in might.
From the heads of kings I have torn the crown,
From the height of fame I have hurled men down,
I have blasted many an honored name,
I have taken virtue and given shame;
I have tempted the youth with a sip, a taste,
That has made his future a barren waste.
Far greater than a king am I,
Or than any army beneath the sky.
I have made the arm of the driver fail,
And sent the train from the iron rail;
I have made good ships go down at sea,
And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me;
For they said, 'Behold how great you be!
Fame, strength, wealth, genius before you fall,
And your might and power are over all.'
Ho! ho! pale brother," laughed the wine,
"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"

Said the water glass, "I cannot boast
Of a king dethroned or a murdered host;
But I can tell of a heart once sad,
By my crystal drops made light and glad;
Of thirsts I've quenched and brows I've laved;
Of hands I have cooled and souls I have saved;
I have leaped through the valleys, dashed down the mountain,
Flowed in the river and played in the fountain,
Slept in the sunshine and dropped from the sky,
And everywhere gladdened the landscape and eye.
I have eased the hot forehead of the fever and pain;
I have made the parched meadows grow fertile with grain;
I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill,
That ground out the flour and turned at my will;
I can tell of manhood debased by you,
That I have lifted and crowned anew.
I cheer, I help, I strengthen and aid;
I gladden the heart of man and maid;
I set the chained wine-captive free,
And all are better for knowing me."
These are the tales they told each other,
The glass of wine and its paler brother,
As they sat together filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim.

LUCK.

A cloudless June sky above, a dusty California mountain road, and a young tenderfoot from Ohio, mounted on a stout broncho, with an outfit consisting of a roll of blankets and a six-shooter.

Fired with visions of suddenly acquired wealth, I had a few weeks before started for California, sorely against the wishes of my parents and advice of my friends. I was riding slowly up the long mountain grade, headed for the gravel mines of the North Fork of the Yuba, and calculated to make the Mountain House by dark, when I was overtaken by a horseman, who rode up beside me a with genial, "How are you, stranger?"

He was a fine-looking man of about thirty, with a blonde beard, and the handsome horse he bestrode was somewhat jaded. We rode on together up the grade, and fell into conversation. He inquired where I was from, and where I was bound for, both of which questions I answered frankly. He told me that he was a mine-owner over on the Middle Fork; that he had just made a business trip down the ridge, and was in a hurry to get back, and added that I had better go with him and he would give me a job. I gratefully accepted his offer, and when we stopped to water about half way up the grade he asked me to carry a small pair of saddle-bags, as his horse was pretty well beat out.

I complied cheerfully, as my beast was comparatively fresh. The bags were heavy, and he remarked as he handed them over that they contained the coin from the last clean up. With a due appreciation of the trust, I felt for my six-shooter, and we pushed on up the grade. Arrived at the top he took a cross-road, remarking that he guessed we could make old man Brown's by night.

I found him a pleasant, entertaining fellow, and being no doubt conceited, imagined that he found me the same. It was nearly dark when we rode up to a low, rambling old building, which he designated as "old man Brown's," and added that it was rather a hard place, but any port in a storm.

As we rode up to the porch a slender girl of about fourteen, with big brown eyes and a shock of red curls, came running round the corner of the house. She looked as wild as a deer, and my first thought was, "What a beauty she will make some day!" I raised my sombrero and asked if we could get accommodations for the night.

"Dunno; I'll ask dad," she said shortly; and darted into the house through the barroom.

A moment later a portly old man in list slippers made his appearance, rubbing his hands and smiling benignly. "How are you, boys? Want to stop? All right. Here, Jess, call Joe to take the horses."

I had just dismounted and started to remove the saddle bags when a glance at my travelling companion checked me. He was gazing back down the road and listening intently. I saw a grayish palor overspread his face. The next moment he struck spurs into the horse and without a word galloped down the road in the opposite direction into the gathering darkness.

Surprised and alarmed, I sprang again into the saddle, and as the sound of horses approaching at a rapid rate came to my ears I started on down the road after my late companion. My first thought was that highwaymen were on our track.

Glancing back, I saw a number of horsemen riding furiously down upon me. I heard loud oaths and orders to halt. Without heeding them I spurred on and drew my six-shooter, determined to sell my life as dearly as possible. The next moment a volley of shots rang out and my horse stumbled and fell.

Before I could rise I was surrounded by the roughest-looking crowd of men it has ever been my misfortune to encounter. Cries of "Kill him!" "Shoot him!" "Hang him!" were heard on all sides, and a dozen hands seized me in no gentle grasp. My horse lay dead. One of the men thrust his hand into the saddle bags and pulled out a sack of coin.

"Here you are, boys! Here's the swag! Hang the blanked thief!" he shouted.

"Let's take him over to Brown's and hear what he's got to say," said a tall man who seemed to be leader.

This proposition met with general disfavor, especially from one officious man, who took a rawhide lariat from his saddle, and leading the way to a spreading oak tree that stood near, exclaimed, "Here's a good limb! Fetch him along, boys!"

But the tall man demurred, and had his way. If he can't give a straight account of himself we'll make short work of him."

I attempted to explain, but a pistol was held at my head with the peremptory command to shut up; so I shut. My arms were securely bound with the lariat. I was marched back to Brown's and placed in one corner of the bar-room.

The crowd then demanded liquid refreshment, which was served by Brown. The girl, Jess, stood in the door looking at me curiously, and I thought rather pityingly. My trial then began. It was brief and to the point. The stage had been robbed the day before, the express messenger killed and several thousand dollars stolen. The robbers, supposed to be two in number, had escaped, and these men had organized a party to hunt them down. Had tracked them thus far and succeeded in capturing me, with part of the stolen money in my possession. Brown testified to our riding up a few minutes before they came and asking leave to stop over night, and added with a solemn shake of his head that they had "let the worst one get away."

They then demanded to know what I had to say, and I told my story in as straightforward a manner as possible. It was listened to incredulously by most of them, but among a few I thought I saw looks that encouraged me, and I wound up with an impromptu appeal for life and liberty which I felt must touch them.

I was doomed to bitter disappointment when the lank man who had "Missouri" written in every lineament, and who had been so officiously anxious to hang me at once, arose, and after expectorating, remarked with a harsh laugh: "Young feller, you can't come it over us that way. Come on, boys. Let's string him up."

Several rose and with oaths loud and deep seconded the motion. My blood ran cold as I realized my imminent peril. These rough miners, who certainly had strong circumstantial evidence against me, felt perfectly justified in hanging me to the nearest tree. What could I do? I gazed from one to the other like a hunted animal.

"Surely you would not hang a man on such evidence as this," I cried. "If you will untie me I can show you letters that will prove who I am."

The tall man, whom they called Joe, stepped up and untied me. I drew out a letter from my mother which I had received while in San Francisco. It contained a card photograph of my pretty sister Alice, which fell to the floor as I drew out the letter. Joe picked it up.

"It's my sister's picture," I cried. "Here; read the letter, any of you. It will prove that I am an honest man."

Joe was gazing earnestly at the picture. "Tell you what, boys, this here's a little beauty." In my heart I blessed her pretty face and only wished her there to plead for me in person.

The picture was passed around, and hope sprang up in my heart, when the old Missourian, who seemed thirsting for my gore, dashed it down again by exclaiming: "How do ye know but what he stole that letter and picter from some one on the stage, or out of the mail bag? It's all bosh! Let's hang him and done with it!"

Joe took the photo again and glanced from it to me. "Now, look'ee here, Mizzoo, seems yer a gittin' cold-blooded in yer old age. Anything with half an eye can see that this gal looks like him."

I thanked God for the resemblence, which was slight, and began to hope again. The girl Jess crowed in among the men and asked to see the picture. Joe handed it to her, jocosely remarking that he'd marry her when she got to be as handsome as that.

She quietly replied: "Shut your mouth," and gazed intently on the picture. "I'll bet that's his sister," she said presently.

"I'm inclined to think so myself," said Joe. "I think we'd better wait, boys, and take him down to the bar."

At this there was a dissenting mumur, which grew so strong that my courage failed again. Suddenly Joe turned to the crowd and cried:

"Tell ye what, boys, let's lay it on to luck. I'll play him a straight game of freeze-out. If he loses he's our meat. What do ye say?"

The idea seemed to tickle the fancy of the crowd. They evidently had confidence in Joe's ability to play poker. Unfortunately for me, it was a game of which I knew nothing and I told them so.

The girl Jess was still standing beside Joe. "Let me play for him," she said eagerly. "Luck's always with me."

"Yes, let her play," cried the man, evidently amused at the novelty of the thing, and also sure that Joe's superior skill would win. "Let Jess play for him. Can you stake her, young feller?"

I looked at the girl curiously. Her big dark eyes were glittering with excitement, but she was cool and self-possessed. Taking out my purse, which contained my wealth, about $100, I handed it to her.

The cards were produced, and in a few moments she and Joe were seated opposite each other, and the game began

It was a weird scene, and I had the odd feeling that I was simply a spectator, and in no way concerned. I remember wishing for sketching material that I might transfer it to canvas. What a picture it would make. The low-ceiled, uninviting room; the smoky lamps shedding a flickering light upon the eager group round the table. I could see the face of the young girl, and knew that in all probability my life hung upon her "luck."

She played in silence except to indicate how many cards she wanted at the draw. It was an even game for a while, then Joe began to win and her pile of coin gradually diminished. She played coolly on, despite the comments of the crowd. She was down to her last dollar when the tide turned in her favor. She won steadily, raking in the coin each time, till Joe was nearly broke. He began to bet cautiously, having evidently no desire to be beaten by a girl.

I watched her face closely for some sign of excitement, but none was visible. She was thoroughly self-possessed, and the fact that she held my life in her hands had no outward effect upon her. Luck turned in Joe's favor again and they were soon about even. The crowd grew impatient. "What ye afraid of, Joe? Where's yer nerve? Why don't yer bet?" and like expressions were heard, while others encouraged the girl. "Old man Brown" came around and patted her on the shoulder, remarking that "Jess always did have the dog-on-dest luck."

They made it a jack pot, and it was Joe's deal. Jess opened it for ten dollars and discarded two. Joe also discarded two, and after a draw gave a short laugh and raised her ten. She glanced at her coin in an uncertain way, then at her hand. She had three dollars less than he. The excitement was intense. For a moment, only the heavy breathing could be heard. Then Jess laughed a little and pushed her last dollar into the pot.

Old "Mizzoo" broke into a discordant laugh. "Jess don't bluff worth a damn," he cried.

Joe calmly pushed in the rest of his money.

"It'll be make or break this time," he said, glancing over at me. "Sorry for ye, young feller. Boys, git yer rope. What ye got, Jess?"

She quietly laid down four nines and the jack of hearts. He held three aces and a pair of eights. He struck the table a blow that made the money jingle. "Good girl! Luck's on your side. I'd 'a' staked my last cent on a full like that, but fours are too much fer me. Come on, boys. Let's irrigate."

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE FROG'S PARTY.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER II.

In exact time to the music the couples advanced, bowed before their host and hostess, and followed Felinus and me. The high chief usher gave a leap, dropped suddenly at my elbow and introduced us to the frog princes and all the principal frog officials.

Just after the introductions we formed in line for a grand promenade. As Felinus and I were the only guests who were not natives of Frogland, we each had a very talented and richly dressed frog princess as companion in the march. The band came up from the edge of the river, and we could see on what they were playing. Their instruments were of different seashells, into which had been put keys, and when one pressed the keys as one would touch a cornet or a fife there came forth beautiful notes.

After marching a few minutes the chief usher stepped aside, and as we passed him he bowed to each guest and pointed with his cane to the seat which each was to occupy at the banquet. The king and the queen were at the head of the table, and Felinus and I were on either side. The table was close to the edge of the river and was made of giant lily leaves, fresh and almost as tough as leather. Our plates were very delicately tinted scallop shells, and our forks were two pronged thorns with pearls at the end of the handles. The spoons were made from mussel shells. Everything had pearl and mother of pearl ornaments, and gold and silver were quite common.

When the plates, knives, forks, spoons and and saucers were all laid in place, in came the frogs with a peach on a kind of a stretcher.

The peach was larger than a flour barrel, and it was so heavy that I was very glad I didn't have to bring one like it on my shoulder.

This peach was the great central dish, and there were many other fruits. The peaches and berries were delicious, and the cream was almost as sweet as honey.

The blueberries were so large that I had to quarter them as you would giant peaches. You wouldn't understand how nice they tasted even if I could tell you, so you can just know that it was a feast to be long remembered.

We had no wine, for the frogs are strictly temperate, but there was a drink something like lemonade in looks, but which, although Felinus and the frogs thought it grand, did not taste so well to me.

I noticed that one of the frogs had come in very late and had no sooner sat down than he commenced to talk very earnestly to his neighbor. He talked just a few seconds, and then he and the neighbor looked at me. I looked in another direction, as it was neither polite nor pleasant to stare at them, but the next time I looked at that side of the table there were a dozen or more frogs who seemed to be very sober and rather sulky. They were passing along some story from one to another around the table.

The next speaker said, "Slip-up told me that this boy ran and chased frogs and threw stones and killed them and broke their bones."

Slip-down was the next frog asked, and he understood that this boy ran and broke his bones killing frogs and throwing stones.

The next frog said that this awful little monster ran and killed ten thousand frogs and broke their bones, throwing stones with Tommy Jones.

The next one said that all boys who ran threw stones at all the frogs and broke their bones with Tommy Jones.

The waiter told the king that any boy who could run was sure to throw stones and do nothing but kill frogs, break their bones with Tommy Jones, and that this boy was one of them. He didn't have time to say wLether I was one of the boys, or one of the stones, or one of the frogs, or one of the bones, or just a companion of bad Tommy Jones.

The king understood that my name was Tommy Jones the frog killer, and that any boy who ran would always throw stones at frogs and that I had killed seventeen thousand frogs. All the frogs felt sure that if I could run I must surely be a frog killing boy.

You see things get awfully mixed when a great many people tell them and say them in a hurry.

The king felt very much grieved at having invited such a guest to his party, and especially at having invited one who would pretend to be a good boy and at the same time would hide his name.

"It is true that you can run?" said he to me. "Yes, sir, your most high and mighty frogship," said I, and all the young frogs had no sooner heard my reply than they stepped down beside the table and each picked up a stone. One stout boy frog more impetuous than the rest gave a leap across the table and began playing with two great rocks as if they had been jackstones.

"Look a-here, young feller," croaked he in a most ferocious voice, "do you reckon we can't throw stones?" Every frog glared at me indignantly. "Put your eye on that lily head out there," said he, and he pointed toward the river. I heard the whiz of a stone through the air, and the lily disappeared. "Break-his-neck, Break-his-neck, Break-his-neck!" croaked the frogs from all sides of the table. The stout boy frog lifted the other stone and looked suggestively at my necktie. "Pooh! What nonthenth to break hith neck?" lisped a little voice at my side, and there stood a small frog urchin with eyes that shone spitefully at me through a pair of bright green goggles.

"What would bad Boy Mortalth do if there weren't no stonth?" he demanded of me. "About the same as the frogs," said I in return. He turned up his nose impudently, pulled his boots a little tighter and gave a leap for the lily head. It disappeared again, and in a moment the frog swam to the shore with the flower in his mouth. He dropped it triumphantly at my feet, and all the frogs croaked wickedly, "Down-his-throat, Down-his-throat, Down-his throat!" The little frog urchin bent his knees as if to spring, and his goggles pointed down my throat. I decided it was all up with me and shut my lips as tightly as possible. Just then King Jumpfar stood up again as the head of the table and blew sharply upon a small whistle.

"Look a here, young feller," croaked he in a most ferocious voice.

Immediately all was quiet, and so great was the attention that not a frog lifted hand or foot.

"We are a peaceful people," said the king, "and all my frogs must behave politely."

Felinus, who was always trusted by every one in Frog river, now stepped up beside me and made a little speech telling the frogs that my name was not Tommy Jones; that I was not one of the boys who always threw stones at frogs, and that because a boy could run was no sign that he was a frog killer.

These speeches from the king and Felinus quieted the frogs and they all apologized very humbly. The frog urchin insisted on shaking hands, and the commotion ceased as suddenly as it had begun.

You know how we play gossip sometimes—that is, one will whisper very quickly to the next one on the right something that the person on the left hand has told. The next one passes it along, and then each one, after the gossip goes around the room, tells what he thinks he heard. These frogs were whispering in the same way. It wasn't polite, but it seemed to be very important and something which must be told immediately.

When the story had got nearly around the table, it was told to one of the waiters, who stepped up to the king and whispered a few words in his ear.

King Jumpfar looked very much shocked and quickly arose at the head of the table. "In order to understand the news which has been told me," said he, "I will ask each tenth guest to tell the story as he or she understood it." The late arrival who had started the story around the table stood up and said, "I met a frog from the outside world who said that boys in his neighborhood ran and chased each other and threw stones, and some of them killed frogs."

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

A BAREFOOTED WEDDING.

It is not far from Washington to the mountains where people live in the most primitive style. J. C. Moffett, the well-known correspondent, went into McDowell county, W. Va., on a professional trip, and among the stories he did not write, but preserved for private friends, is one too good to keep out of print.

He stopped at a log cabin and was soon on good terms with his host, who after supper said:—

"Stranger, I reckon yo' won't hev a good time to-night."

"What is up?" queried the newspaper man.

"Goin' ter be a weddin'. Reckon yo' kin go with me an' the ole 'ooman."

The invitation was accepted and the three started for a five-mile walk over the mountain. When they had reached the cabin that was the center of festivities, a cracked fiddle could be heard, and several men hung around the doors and windows, for none but the dancers could be admitted inside.

They were met by a rough mountaineer, to whom the newspaper man's presence was explained.

"That's all right," said the newcomer, "but thar's one thing. Yo' see the bride an' groom air po', an' they never wore no shoes befo' Christmas in thar lives, an' hain't got n one now, so them as had shoes didn't wear 'em. Jim, the groom, is sorter sensitive-like, an' high-strung, so ef yo' go with them shoes on he might take it as a reflection on him an' the bride an' go to shootin'."

The shoes were taken off and 10 minutes later the correspondent and his host were dancing with the mountain belles, occasionally having to stop to pick splinters out of their feet.

BIRDS ENJOY HOT WEATHER.—All birds seem to enjoy the heat, provided that they can obtain water, which in this country is never wanting except on the chalk downs when the ponds dry up. There the rooks wait till dusk around the troughs from which the sheep are watered, evidently suffering agutely from thirst. But pigeons will seek out the hottest slopes and angles of the roofs, and common roadside birds, such as the yellowhammers and pipits, sit out in the sun all day. Most of the insect-eating birds, except the flying catcher, retire to the trees and bushes, and both chickens and partridges purposely seek shade. The former, if no other cover is available, will lie in the shadow of a wall, creeping close up to it as the line of shade narrows toward midday. Partridges either lie under the hedges or move into the turnip fields, when, as in hot September weather, the leaves are broad enough to cover them. But our wild birds never suffer from the heat like those of Australia, where the parrots and lories have been seen to drop down dead when forced to fly across the open ground in a summer drouth.—London Spectator.

WHY HE WANTED HIS FATHER.—A more or less distinguished young foreigner placed an advertisement in the personal column of a morning newspaper a few days ago, requesting information as to the whereabouts of his father, who had left his family in Europe years ago and had been heard from last in San Francisco. A certain private detective with an eye to business noticed the advertisement, and in due course of time an agent connected with his bureau called upon the more or less distinguished young foreigner and informed him that should he call at the office he could make arrangements to have his father found. He did so. After a long talk with the head of the bureau, to whom he gave full particulars about his missing parent, he was informed that his father could undoubtedly be found, and that the charges would be $25 as a starter and $25 when the job is completed. "Mein Gott!" he exclaimed. "Das is what I want mein fadder for!" The deal fell through.—San Francisco Examiner.

The Journal.

FRIDAY EVENING, AUGUST 14, 1896.

MR. BRYAN is evidently one of the to-the victors-belong-the-spoils-what- are- we- herefor? kind of politicians, for he told the crowd at an Ohio town the other day that "I am not distributing post offices yet, but I hope to be before long." There's nothing like hopes.

REPRESENTATIVE Apsley of Massachusetts has decided that he will not accept a renomination, and will retire from politics at the close of his present term in Congress. Mr. Apsley was elected by over 8000 majority last time, and was assured of a practically unanimous renomination.

HARPER'S WEEKLY, which has been an advocate of Cleveland and the Democratic policy of the past few years, now announces in bold-faced type at the head of its editorial column that "The Nation's Honor must be Preserved," and for president and vice president prints the names of McKinley and Hobart.

WITH the continuance of the war in Cuba the vender of the "ripe-a banan, fresh-a ripe-a banan" is likely to be forced to choose another occupation. Since Gen. Weyler's decree closing the ports of Banes and Sama went into effect, the shipment of the fruit has been so expensive that it will now be stopped altogether, it is said.

THE Massachusetts branch of the American Federation of Labor has handsomely apologized to W. Murray Crane for the injustice done him in accusing him of unfriendliness to the laboring man. There was evidently politics behind the first move in the matter, and the outcome will be quite as likely to help Mr. Crane as those who had hoped to gain by the charges against him.

WARREN voters, just over the line into Worcester county, are very much interested in the rearrangement of the representative districts down that way. The town has been in a double district, and while the relations of the various towns with each other have always been pleasant, Warren is now pleading for a separate district. As a general thing double districts are unsatisfactory all around.

A NEW HAVEN woman has discovered a new way of collecting a board bill. One of her boarders made love to her and let his payments run behind. All was satisfactory, however, until he began to pay attention to another female, one of her servants; then she had him locked up for defrauding her of her board bill, but offered to call the account square if he would marry her, and the poor fellow, seeing no other way out of jail, accepted.

EIGHT cents a day and board is pretty small wages for a grown man to work for, and yet under the vagrancy laws of Kentucky a white man was sold to another at auction the other day for $12.75, that sum securing the man's labor for six months. If he's anything like the Northern vagrants—and we suspect they're pretty much the same the world over—the layer will be lucky if he isn't out the man's board, as well as the $12.75.

ONE of the features of the summer camp-meetings at Old Orchard, Me., is the annual contribution for missionary purposes. The amount usually runs well up in the thousands, and last Sunday reached the magnificent sum of $101,324. In addition, 100 persons volunteered as missionaries for the foreign field. The sums given ranged from 50 cents to $1000 in cash, while many persons in the audience contributed gold watches and gold pins, one man gave a piano and another a bicycle.

A WORKMAN in Rockaway, N. J., was given a free silver lesson the other day which he did not relish. He had been incessantly talking the beauties of free silver, and when pay-day came was given his week's wages in "cart-wheel" dollars,—fifteen of them. He looked at them dubiously at first, and acted a little in doubt as to the advisability of taking them; then openly doubted if he could be made to take his pay "in them things." He finally decided however that they were legal tender, but he isn't talking as much free silver as he was.

THE Legislature of Illinois now has an opportunity to investigate something more important than the manner in which the proprietors of department stores conduct their business. J. T. Brooks, one of the vice presidents of the Pennsylvania railway lines west of Pittsburg, says that the tax commissioners of Illinois made him a proposition that for a consideration they would reduce the valuations of the Pennsylvania companies in that state. It remains to be seen what notice of the charge will be taken by the Legislature.

SELDOM is the country called upon to undergo such a broiling as it has experienced during the past nine days, during which the mercury has averaged about 95° in the shade in the cooler states, while in the west the record has been much higher. In the large cities the suffering has been terrible; hundreds of people have been prostrated by the heat, and the deaths have been numbered by scores; hundreds of horses have died from the heat. And there seemed no way of escape. After the first two or three days those who could sought relief in supposedly cooler localities, but at mountains and shore there was little difference, the heat seeming to penetrate every nook and corner. There is a grateful lowering of the temperature to-day, which will mean thesaving of many lives in the centers of population.

MR. BRYAN has been officially notified that he is the nominee of the Democratic party for president of the United States, with Mr. Sewall for a running mate. The event took place in Madison Square Garden, New York, Wednesday evening, and if looked at candidly the after results are likely to be anything but pleasing to the managers of Mr Bryan's campaign. The affair was not the howling success which was hoped for. The crowd was not nearly so large as anticipated, none of the men who represent the Democratic party as evidenced by the present administration were present, and last of all, Mr. Bryan fell far short of what had been promised for him. His speech of acceptance was to far surpass in brilliancy and oratory the one which made him famous and secured his nomination at Chicago, but he failed to even approach it, and the result is thought to be a reaction against him to a no inconsiderable extent.

A PECULIAR case is that of young Willis of Taunton, and the record of crime traced to him reads more like a "Dare Devil Dick" dime novel than one would expect to find in real life. A few days ago a bicycle store in Providence was entered by a young fellow who attempted to steal a wheel, and when interfered with he escaped by jumping through a plate glass window, and in his flight shot two men. Last Saturday the police of Taunton arrested in that place Herbert Willis, 19, as the man wanted for various misdemeanors in that vicinity. Young Willis had two revolvers when arrested in his father's fish market, and attempted to use them, but prompt action on the part of the officers prevented him from hurting anyone; as it was he gave five of Taunton's best officers a five-minutes fight before he was overpowered. After being lodged in jail he made a confession which included manslaughter, four burglaries, several thefts of wheels, one highway robbery and two attempts to kill. And all within two months. As the young man says, he lived fast while he was at it. The man he killed was his friend, and the shooting was accidental, Willis says, while he was robbing his friend's companion on the highway. He had the nerve to go to the funeral, and appeared overcome with grief. The peculiar part of the story is that his mania for crime came to him all at once. He committed his first burglary just to see if he had nerve enough to doit, and finding that he had, it was but a short step to any crime which seemed to please his fancy; and the most approved highwayman could have been no more daring or fearless. The rest of the young man's days will probably be spent behind the bars.

PALMER NEWS.

SPECIAL TOWN MEETING.

Schoolhouses to be Repaired—Sewer Nuisance to be Abated.

At the special town meeting last Saturday afternoon the voters decided to make necessary repairs only on the Three Rivers and Palmer schoolhouses, leaving the matter of new ventilating apparatus in the Palmer building for future consideration. It was voted to abate the sewer nuisance on Commercial street in the Depot village, and to move the iron bridge at Bondsville to Thorndike. An appropriation was also made for the use of the board of health.

H. C. Strong was chosen moderator. The report of the special committee on schoolhouses was made by Dr. Holbrook, who stated that the committee had examined the building at Three Rivers and found that new floors would have to be laid in four of the rooms, the lath and plaster removed from two of the rooms, and the floors strengthened in a few places. These repairs would not cost over $275, and when completed the building would meet the requirements of the inspectors. The building in the Depot village the committee had had examined by two experts on ventilation. One planned to used the present heating apparatus and put a fan in the attic to draw out the foul air, to be run by a water motor in the cellar; this plan would cost about $2000. The other recommended a new heating and ventilating apparatus, at a cost of $2470 exclusive of the carpenter work, which the committee estimated at over $100. Neither plan was recommended by the committee, which advised that $250 be raised for necessary repairs,—reshingling and some other matters. The report of the committee was accepted and adopted.

When the question of how the money needed—about $500—should be raised, it was suggested that it might be taken from the highway money, as $7500 was appropriated for the roads this year, and it was doubted whether many of the voters understood that so much was to be spent. This suggestion was vigorously opposed by Dr. Holbrook, who said that his motion in the annual town meeting contemplated that very thing,—the expenditure of $3500 this year in permanent highway building, and $4000 for ordinary care of the roads. The voters were with him, and it was voted that the money be taken from such of the school funds as might not be needed for school purposes, but that if there was not enough from this source the town treasurer was authorized to negotiate a temporary loan not to exceed $500.

The article regarding repairs at the high school, and the connection of that building with the sewer, was passed over, as it was announced that the school committee had arranged for the matter.

The sewer nuisance on Commercial street in the Depot village was ordered abated, and the matter was left in the hands of the selectmen to act as they deemed for the best interests of the town. The sum of $250 was appropriated for this work, in addition to about $150 left from the Main and Thorndike streets sewer appropriation.

The unused iron bridge over the river at Bondsville was ordered moved to the canal at Thorndike, and $300 appropriated for the work.

An appropriation of $300 was made for the use of the board of health, that matter having been overlooked at the annual town meeting.

The suits against the town were left with the selectmen to act as they deemed best.

To meet the bills authorized by the meeting, the treasurer was authorized to borrow money to an amount not exceeding the appropriations.

Prizes for the Bicycle Races.

Entries for the bicycle tournament to be held Labor Day are coming in thick and fast, and what is more, they are coming from fast riders. The work of putting the track in condition will probably be commenced by next week. It is to be rolled with a steam roller and the surface made as hard as possible. This involves considerable expense, but the management is determined to have the track in first-class condition. A wagon has been on the road during the week advertising the meet through all the surrounding towns. The following is the list of races and the prizes which are offered, every one being a diamond: One mile, 2 45 class, 1st prize, $25 diamond, 2d, $20 diamond, 3d, $10 diamond scarf pin; one mile open, 1st, $35 diamond, 2d, $30 diamond, 3d, $25 diamond; two-mile hand-i-cap, 1st, $35 diamond, 2d, $25 diamond, 3d, $15 diamond; one-half mile open, 1st, $35 diamond, 2d, $25 diamond, 3d, $15 diamond.

Permanent Highway Building Began.

The work of macadamizing Thorndike street was begun Monday morning. The street will be macadamized in the center for a width of 16 feet, and will be gravelled on each side for a width of three feet. In macadamizing the following process is gone through with: First a strip the desired width is excavated to a depth of about ten inches; the bed is then rolled, and a layer of coarse trap rock about four inches thick is put on and rolled. After this a layer of finer rock about three inches thick is put on and rolled, and the last layer of still finer rock about an inch thick is then put on and the final rolling given, the whole being thoroughly wet to make it pack close. The trap rock and steam roller are to be furnished by the Flynt Granite Company of Monson. The street will be macadamized as far as the money appropriated—$3500—will allow, which it is thought will bring it near the top of the hill. Selectman Charles Brainerd has charge of the work.

Fiske—Washburn.

A small company of relatives and immediate friends gathered at the home of Mrs. E. C. Washburn on Park street Wednesday morning to witness the marriage of Frank W. Washburn and Miss Flora Fiske. The ceremony was performed in the parlor by Rev. C. R. Minard of the Baptist church, the couple standing under an arch of golden-rod and ferns in one corner of the room. The apartments were tastefully decorated with cut flowers and potted plants. The bride wore a dress of steel gray silk, trimmed with Irish point lace, and carried a bouquet of 21 pinks. After the ceremony refreshments were served. There were a number of handsome and useful wedding presents. Mr. and Mrs. Washburn left on the 11 o'clock New London Northern train for Charlestown, N. H., were they will remain for a few days, afterward making a trip to northern New York. The bride's traveling gown was of blue novelty, trimmed with brown.

A Lively Runaway.

Last Friday evening a pair of horses hitched to a load of hay left standing in front of Allen's livery stable started upon the run up Walnut street. A. T. Wing and W. E. McDonald were driving down the street and met the runaway near the corner of Walnut and Park streets. The street at this point is quite narrow, and to avoid the runaway Mr. Wing was obliged to drive upon the sidewalk near the residence of Survetus Leach, and then he barely escaped, for the wagon was hit by the load of hay but not damaged. The runaway, after passing them, turned the corner and the wagon was overturned in front of E. P. Ball's residence. The horses broke loose from the wagon and continued on down Park street to the corner of Thorndike and Park, where they were captured. No damage was done to the horses or wagon, and the only thing to arouse the ire of the owner was the necessity of having to reload the hay.

More School Teachers Appointed—Date of Opening Schools Changed.

At a meeting of the school committee Tuesday evening, three more teachers were appointed. Miss Mary Whelan, a graduate of Westfield Normal, was assigned the school at Palmer Center. Miss Whelan has had two years experience as teacher. Miss Lucy B. Twiss was given the Shorley district, and the 6th and 7th grades at Thorndike were assigned to Miss O. A. Thompson, a graduate of Johnson Normal and University of Vermont, and a teacher with six years experience. The contract for making the repairs on the schoolhouses at Three Rivers and Palmer, which were authorized at the town meeting Saturday, was awarded to Charles Ruggles of Three Rivers. The Palmer and Monson gun clubs shot a match at Monson Tuesday afternoon. The Monsons were victorious, winning by the score of 39 to 29, out of a possible 60. The Palmers lay their defeat to the fact that they were given only ten shots each and did not have a chance to get used to the trap, but they feel confident of winning the return match when held.

Only one track of the Boston and Albany road was in use between this station and West Brimfield last Sunday, workmen being engaged in putting in a new culvert under the other track at that station. The road is replacing all its stone culverts with new ones of round iron piping, which are said to be much better than the old style, and leave the surface of the roadbed unbroken.

A Syrian who has been peddling various wares about the town during the past few days in order to educate himself "for the Christian ministry," has made a nuisance of himself in many instances where ladies declined to invest in his wares. William Simonds, who lives on the Charles Upham place on the Ware road, met with a serious injury in front of the post office at Ware Thursday evening. He sustained three bad cuts on the head and his shoulder was also injured. He was attended by Dr. Miner, who removed him to his home.

A party of Methodists from West Warren who picnicked at Forest Lake a week ago to-day came near meeting with a serious accident. On the way home a three-seated wagon containing nine persons was crossing the Ware River railroad track when the train from the north arriving here at 5.13 came along. The occupants of the wagon did not see the train. The brakes were put on and the wagon just cleared the track as the train dashed by.

Marks have been set up at the passenger station within a few days to assist the engineers of passenger trains on the Boston and Albany road to stop their trains at exactly the right place for the taking of water, thus preventing the liability of running by and having to back the train. One of the Duryea motor wagons passed through town last week Wednesday on its way from Springfield to Harvard, a man in that town having purchased it. The wagon made the distance from Springfield to West Brookfield — 29 miles — in three hours. In speaking of the roads between Springfield and West Brookfield the man in charge of the wagon said that they were very poor, and those in Palmer were especially bad, worse than those in any other town he passed through.

Persons who were on Main street about 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon were considerably startled to see a large female dash wildly through the street from Central street toward Thorndike. She was on all fours in the middle of the street, and as the garment which enveloped her was considerably torn, allowing the exposure of a goodly share of anatomy, the spectacle naturally attracted no little attention. People on the sidewalks shouted, and attempts to stop her were made, all unsuccessful however until, opposite the JOURNAL office, she was seized and halted by a spectator. She at first seemed to resent any interference with her actions, but soon calmed down and remained quiet. John Coles soon made his appearance, climbed on the seat of his express wagon and drove "Lady Coles" back to the spot from which she had taken "French leave" a few moments before.

District Court.

David J. Downey of Bondsville was before the court Tuesday for being drunk last Saturday, and pleaded not guilty to the charge. He was arrested on complaint of his wife, who appeared in court and told in a graphic manner the story of her abuse, and also testified that Downey was drunk on the day mentioned. Downey said that the whole testimony was a falsehood, but the court thought different and fined him $5. Downey refused to pay the fine and was committed, but his wife was so grieved at seeing her husband about to depart for jail that she relented and paid his fine.

William Powers of Stafford was assessed $5 for the privilege of being drunk in Monson, and not being able to pay the fine was committed. When taken to Springfield and searched at the jail, $25 was found secreted upon his person. He paid his fine and as he went away remarked he would go on another drunk.

Fred Barber's little girl, about 6 years old, was overcome by the heat last Wednesday. She was playing on the sidewalk with other children, and all at once ran into the house where her mother was, saying that her head ached dreadfully. She was put in a cool room and in a few minutes her mother went in to see how she was getting along. Upon entering the room she found her, as she supposed, dead. Two Boys Drowned.

Two sons of W. Butterfield, Willard and Roland, aged respectively 15 and 12 years, were drowned early Tuesday afternoon in the Swift river. They were seen going toward the river shortly after one o'clock, and over an hour later their clothes were seen on the banks, but as the boys were not in sight suspicion was aroused. There were other boys swimming farther down the river, but they had seen or heard nothing of them. Officer Collins was called and a search was begun, and in a short time both bodies were found in a place known as the "Bend," where the water was between ten and fifteen feet deep. Medical Examiner Holbrook was summoned and reported accidental drowning. As neither of the boys knew how to swim it is thought they accidentally got beyond their depth. The bodies were found about 20 feet apart. The funeral was held Wednesday afternoon, and was conducted by Rev. Robert E. Smith; the children of the Sabbath school, of which both boys were members, sang. There were many pretty floral offering.

Spencers 8—Thorndikes 7.

The Thorndikes played the Wire Mill company's nine at Spencer Saturday, and were defeated, 8 to 7. The game was well played and was interesting from start to finish. It is said the umpire roasted the Thorndikes and was mainly responsible for that team losing the game. Sugrue pitched his usual good game, and he and Kelley hit the ball hard. The score:

NEIGHBORHOOD NOTES.

MONSON.

Three Rivers 16—Monson 15.

The Three Rivers ball team took the Monsons into camp last Saturday by a score of 16 to 15. The result was chiefly due to the failure of Kearns's arm in the second inning, when he forced in three runs by bases on balls. He had to give way to Shanahan, who pitched a good game. The team will go to West Warren to-morrow. It is doubtful if any more games are played here, as it is hard work to raise sufficient funds to meet expenses. The following is the score:

The New England Fair.

The "New England Fair" is an institution holding an honored place in the esteem of all true New Englanders, and its growth has been of such a steady character, that the exhibition now embraces every known contrivance which trends to benefit and improve the method in agriculture besides the display of stock and produce, which alone is of sufficient prominence to attract thousands.

Rigby Park is the ground upon which the "New England Fair" will be held on August 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and every effort has been made by the management to make the Fair a memorable success. Rigby Park is but a few miles from Portland, and the exhibition grounds are so arranged and perfected as to place them among the best hereabouts.

It might be said that there are a thousand and one attractions, which are, every one of them, unique and interesting and well worth seeing. Racing as usual will be a prominent feature, and for both the horse and bicycle races, there are many crack entries. Johnson, the famous world's champion bicyclist, and many noted English and French, as well as the best American experts, are entered.

Tuesday will be Press Day; Wednesday, Grange Day; Thursday, Governor's Day, and Mayor's Day will be on Friday.

Band concerts, balloon ascensions, parachute drops and divers and other novelties are on the list for amusements, while talks of a practical nature will be given at City Hall by persons of no less renown than Olive Thorne Miller, Col. J. H. Brigham, Master of the National Grange, and others.

The famous cattle from Hood's farm will be exhibited, and the French Coaching horses from Sanborn's stables will be shown off to the best advantage. There is to be a "Midway" far more complete than last year's, with many new attractions, and taking all in all, it is the greatest show of the season.

From every station on the Boston & Maine System, tickets will be on sale, which include an admission to the Fair Grounds. Information regarding rates can be obtained at station ticket offices.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Mr. G. Cailloutte, druggist, Beaversville, Ill., says: "To Dr. King's New Discovery I owe my life. Was taken with la grippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail, and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. Won't keep store or house without it." Get a free trial of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle, and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. WM. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Since 1878 there have been nine epidemics of dysentery in different parts of the country in which Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy was used with perfect success. Dysentery, when epidemic, is almost as severe and dangerous as Asiatic cholera. Heretofore the best efforts of the most skilled physicians have failed to check its ravages; this remedy, however, has cured the most malignant cases, both of children and adults, and under the most trying conditions, which proves it to be the best medicine in the world for bowel complaints. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

The strength which comes to us from eating nourishing food is better than stimulation, because it is new strength.

The health which belongs to a strong body, well nourished by proper food (properly digested), is the only health that is lasting.

The difference between Shaker Digestive Cordial and other medicines is simply that it helps nature to make strength. It does not profess to cure sickness, except as that sickness is a result of weakness caused by food not properly digested.

Shaker Digestive Cordial will relieve the pangs of indigestion, and make thin, sick, weak people as well as if their stomachs had never been out of order.

It is a gentle aid to the digestion of nature's strength-maker, food.

HOT WEATHER.

An Easy Way to Keep Comfortable.

It is only through food that the human body is sustained. Food makes good blood if it is properly digested. The proper operation of the organs of the body will be carried on perfectly as a rule if one will abandon the habits of tobacco, whisky, coffee, etc. Stomach quickly recovers itself and does its work correctly.

Those who find it hard to give up coffee can do so easily if they will use Postum Cereal in its place. This is made of pure grains but looks and smells like fine coffee, while it has only elements of wheat, etc. which are nourishing and fattening.

Postum Cereal is eminently the drink for hot weather, as it contains all the elements of food necessary for the body and helps one stand the nervous strain on the system during the heated term.

There is but one genuine original Postum Cereal coffee, with a multitude of imitations, offered as "just as good."

My little boy, when two years of age, was taken very ill with bloody flux. I was advised to use Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and luckily procured part of a bottle. I care fully read the directions and gave it accordingly. He was very low, but slowly and surely he began to improve, gradually recovered, and is now as stout and strong as ever. I feel sure it saved his life. I never can praise the Remedy half its worth. I am sorry every one in the world does not know how good it is, as I do.—Mrs. Linda S. Hinton, Grahamsville, Marion Co., Florida. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

LINENS.

You know what we are doing in linens. Out of linen-buying time, when there's almost nothing going on in linen stores, when nobody wants any linens, when there isn't any possible chance to sell linens, we are selling more than ever we've sold in the hight of linen-buying times. There's reason for it, an economical reason, of course.

What other reason could bring it about? Linens are cheap; but that wouldn't sell them in August. They are cheaper than cheap. They are as good as usual, and so low that nobody dreams of getting linens so again this year.

Better use them this way, if you don't use Pearline. Give your tired arms and aching back a rest, somehow, when you're scrubbing and cleaning. "An absurd idea?" Of course. But when a person has cleaned house with Pearline year in and year out, and knows how much work it saves, and time, and rubbing, nothing seems more absurd than to try to clean house without it.

Pearline—no soap with it—just Pearline—makes housecleaning easy. 466

Life.

Life is a thread that for a while suspends
Our souls betwix two worlds, so frail it tends
To fill our hearts with fear that we shall be Translated swift by evil destiny;
So strong that want and weariness and gain
United oft assail it all in vain.

Life is a breath that floats us here and there—
To-day across some sea, calm, bright, and fair;
To-morrow, o'er the waves that breath becomes
A hurricane that madly sweeps us on;
Midst crushing spars and sails to ribbons blown,
We learn our weakness, our dependence own.

Life is a trust, and hoping, praying on,
Contented, on we move till hope is gone.
But equal to our trust our days are fair;
As it grows weak rise clouds of dark despair.
Have courage, then, trust God from morn till even,
And o'er life's sunny ways pass on to heaven.

STORIES OF AN OLD SALT.

At the latest of these story telling evenings, which are a chief feature of the Aldine club of New York, Admiral Erben was persuaded to relate a few incidents. The bluff old seaman, who, according to the Tribune's report, "carries the blush from Neptune's kiss in his bronzed cheek," rose and was greeted in right royal fashion. He said that after he had accepted the invitation of the club he had been asked if he would not relate some incidents of the sea, or as they say on board ship, "spin a yarn." He wished it understood in advance that the old-time sailor of whom Marryat wrote is fast passing away. In fact, he had about disappeared from the sea. But the sailors had always been loyal. Jack had always been true to his ship, true to his officers, no matter what might come. He had known sailors, when a court-martial was about to be held, to go to their officers and ask for exact information as to what they were to testify.

This led him to recall that in the war a big dry dock lying at Pensacola had broken from her moorings and floated down the bay, only to strand under the guns of Fort Pickett. A boat's crew of sailors were at hand to assist the army people, and finally it was decided, inasmuch as the dry dock could not be recovered, to send out and set her on fire. The boat's crew of 12 men and a coxswain were assigned to this duty. "They did their work, and although my own vessel was 75 miles out to sea," said the admiral, "you could almost see to read by the light of the fire. An inquiry was instituted. After the men had set the dock on fire they rowed away, and, of course, the crew had their eyes turned on the burning dock. Yet when they were called up to give evidence and were asked, 'Did you see any light?' they answered, 'No, sir!'

"When I was in London last year," the admiral continued, when the laugh had subsided, "we were well treated. The theatre people were very kind to us, sending tickets and telling us that our men would have the entree of any theatre at any time. So Jack went to every theatre in London and enjoyed himself. One night with a party of friends I went to the Royal opera. We were hardly seated in our box when one of the ladies looked down into the stalls and said: 'Why, admiral, there are some of your men here.' I said I thought not, for none of them would want to sit out a performance of Verdi's 'Falstaff.' But I looked down, and sure enough there were three of my men, and they stayed the performance through. The next day I called up that hickory-faced old boatswain's mate and asked him how he liked the opera. 'Well,' he said, 'admiral, you couldn't leave till the Prince of Wales left, and I couldn't leave till you did, and we stayed it out.'"

By this time the admiral had got warmed to his work, and he told still another yarn on the late Admiral Gregory, when the latter was a captain in the navy. The latter was serving in European waters and had taken his ship into Malta, where a British ship was lying. The idea of hospitality in those days was to entertain a man until either host or guest went under the table, and the work was not considered will done until this had been accomplished. They kept changing the officers on Capt. Gregory when he went to call on the English officers, and seeing that he would not be able to stand the strain of the brandy the American quietly raised his glass and let the liquor down inside his old-fashioned stock neck-tie. He kept this up until the British captain was taken to bed by his steward. Then Captain Gregory called for a fresh bottle of brandy, took another, smoked a pipe, went on deck, talked with the officer of the watch, and was rowed back to his ship. The next day when the Englishman awoke he called the officer of the watch and asked him when Capt. Gregory left the ship. Told the hour, he said: "Well, was he screwed?"—a nautical term for a particular condition. He was told that the American was sober. Then he sought his cabin steward and asked the same question. "No, sir," remarked the steward, "he was all right, but I never saw a man sweat as he did, sir."

THE BOY KEPT HIS PROMISE.

Much is said in these days about the want of obedience to parental authority displayed by the rising generation, but an incident in which the contrary spirit was manifested is narrated by a prominent Western lawyer.

His twelve-years-old son, a boy of great spirit, but with no over-abundance of strength, went to pass a vacation with a cousin who lives on the banks of a broad river. His father in his parting instructions, placed only one restriction upon the boy's amusements during his visit.

"I dont want you to go out in your cousin's canoe," he said firmly. "They are used to the water, but you are not, and you haven't learned to sit still anywhere, as yet. You'll be there only a week, and with all the other amusements the boys have and the horses and dogs, you can afford to let the canoe alone for this time, and keep your mother from worrying all the while you're away."

The boy readily gave the desired promise. On his return he was enthusiastic over the pleasures he had enjoyed.

"And I didn't mind not canoeing a bit, pa," he said, addressing his careful parent, with beaming smile. "The boys taught me how to swim, and the only time they used the canoe was the last day, to go over to the other shore. But I remembered my promise, and I wasn't going to break it the last day ,so I swam across."

"The reason why the British want to swallow up half of Venezuela," asserted Pat, "is because of the gold there is down there." "Sure," replied Mike, "they're always after gold, the English. If they were lauded on an uninhabited island, they would not be there an hour before they'd have their hands in the pockets of the naked savages!"—Harper's Round Table.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

LUCK.

He led the way to the bar, followed by a crowd, now seemingly in the best of humors. Jess calmly raked in the pot, put the money in my purse and handed it to me, remarking laconically, "Here; you'd better take this and git."

"I don't want it all," I exclaimed. "Only what I put in."

"Keep it all. It's yours. They've killed your horse," and before I could say anything more she left the room.

My first impulse was to put as much distance as possible between myself and the crowd, but on second thoughts I reflected that there was no other house within several miles, that I knew nothing of the country, and if I started out on foot I was liable to be run down by another gang of robber-hunters. I therefore put on a bold front and asked Brown to give me a lodging for the night.

He picked up a guttering candle, called Jess, and told her to show me to the "correl." This was a big loft over the bar-room, in which were a dozen or more uninviting looking beds. She placed the candle on a box beside one of these and was about to leave the room, when I detained her.

"Miss Jessie, I have not yet thanked you for what you have done for me to-night. My life is not worth much, but I should have hated to give it up in that manner. Is there nothing I can do to show my gratitude?"

She laughed in an embarrassed manner. "Why, it wasn't anything. I like to play; I'd 'a' done it for anybody."

"I am sure of that; but is there nothing I can do for you?"

She hesitated a moment. "Would you mind giving me that picture?"

"What! My sister's? No, indeed; you can have it and welcome. She is one of the sweetest girls on earth, and would be only too glad to do what she could for any one who is kind to me."

She took it and thanked me. "I thought I'd like to look at it. I'm much obliged. Good-night."

I did not see her about the house next morning. All the participants in the wished-for necktie party of the night before had vanished. I saw nothing of the saddle-bags, so concluded they had taken them. I inquired for Miss Jessie, and was told that she had gone off early to drive up some cattle on the "divide." The Chinese cook provided me with a scanty breakfast, and when the stage came by I mounted it with a feeling of inexpressible relief. Half a hour later as we rounded a curve in the road, we came face to face with Jess. She was mounted on a vicious-looking black mustang, and galloped rapidly past, her bright curls streaming in the wind. I had only time to raise my hat in response to a smile of recognition, when she passed, as I then thought, out of my life forever.

I had been in the mines but a short time when I received the sad news of my father's death, accompanied by an urgent request from my mother that I return home at once and take charge of his business affairs. This was incumbent upon me as I was an only son.

So within three months of the time of my arrival in California I was again at home, my gold-hunting fever slightly abated, but still hoping to return to the Pacific Coast; but circumstances combined to prevent it.

Alice welcomed me with open arms. She was intensely interested in my California experience, and wished very much to write to Jessie and thank her for liberating me from my dangerous situation; but as I did not know her address, she had to abandon the idea. She died the second year after I returned, leaving only my mother and myself. As she was averse to leaving the old home, I remained there until her death, some twelve years later. Then finding life intolerably monotonous, I arranged my business, in which I had been very successful, so that I could leave for an indefinite time.

I felt a strong desire to re-visit the scenes of my early California experience, and in due time found myself at —— City. Much of its former glory had departed. The closing of the hydraulic mines had caused quite an exodus from the region. I decided to make the mountain trip on horseback as of yore, so hired a good one from the livery stable in the town, and one bright June morning started again over the almost forgotten mountain grades.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

THE TIME OF PARTING.

"Laura."

There was an undertone of sadness in the young man's voice. Outside all was calm. The full October moon shone—pronounce it shon, please—peacefully on a community that was beginning to wrap itself in dreams. Whatever of misery or squalor—sound the a long—had disfigured the landscape in the garish light of day was hid from view beneath the friendly shadows of night, and there was nothing in sight to vex the eye of the man in the moon or bring the flush of indignation to his rounded cheek.

The quick ear of Miss Kajones caught the melancholy inflection of young Ferguson's voice.

"What is it, George?" she whispered.

Even in the semi-darkness of the Kajones parlor the face of the maiden might have been observed to take on a paler shade, and for a moment the youth did not reply. The cat on the rug awoke from a troubled dream, yawned, stretched itself, turned the other side to the fire and went to sleep again, and the flowers in the vase—kindly call this vahz—on the piano diffused their mild, grateful perfume through the apartment.

At last the young man spoke.

"Dearest!" he murmured.

"What is it?"

"It is growing late."

He looked at his watch.

"It is growing late," he repeated, tremulously. "The last car will pass along in three-quarters of an hour. I must leave you in exactly forty minutes"—and he clutched her hand—"in forty minutes exactly! Dearest I—"

"Oh, George!"

"I must begin to say good-night!"—Chicago Tribune.

PARENTAL.—A well beloved but sometimes turbulent very small boy is so popular in his neighborhood that he frequently receives formal invitations to dine with grown people who enjoy his society. Such a social attention from the Dawsons was received through the mail the other day, and, with the usual physical and mental distress, the mother achieved the two great tasks of getting the three-years-old son into dinner toilet and keeping him spotless until the time came for him to go. At the household dinner, not long after his departure, the proud father of the urchin said, blithely, "Well, I wonder how little Walter is getting along?" And the long suffering mother sighed and answered, "I don't. I wonder how the Dawsons are getting along."—Indianapolis Journal.

THEIR FIRST RAILROAD RIDE.

The first railroad ride is naturally a somewhat exciting experience. A correspondent of the Chicago Times Herald says that he was taking a trip through the hilly part of Alabama, where the road bed is intersected by a trestle from 50 to 175 feet high, and from 50 yards to half a mile in length. At a small station in the pine woods an old gentleman, carrying a carpet-bag and accompanied by an old lady, evidently his wife, boarded the train.

They took the first seat, the old lady setting next the window. It was apparent from their expression of curiosity mingled with anxiety that this was their first railway journey. The train started, and they both looked eagerly from the window, and as the speed increased a look of keenest anxiety gathered on the old lady's face. She grasped her husband's arms and said in a voice plainly audible to those about her:

"Joel, we be goin' awful quick, I know 'taint safe."

A few minutes later the train ran onto one of the long trestles. With a little shriek of terror the old lady sprang to her feet and seized the back of the seats in front of her. There she stood, trembling from head to foot, staring from the window.

Meantime the train sped onward and was soon once more on solid earth. The old lady was quick to notice the change. Her features relaxed, and she sank into her seat with the fervent exclamation:

"Thank goodness, she's lit again!"

"As I understand it, doctor, if I believe I'm well, I'll be well. Is that the idea?" "It is." "Then, if you believe you're paid, I suppose you'll be paid?" "Not necessarily." "But why shouldn't faith work as well in one case as in the other?" "Why, you see, there is considerable difference between having faith in the Almighty and having faith in you."—Chicago Tribune.

is nearly here; that means a bargainfest to Clothing, Furnishing and Hat buyers. There's always an accumulation of odds and ends at the end of a season's business. Can't help it. The economical thing for us to do, is to get broken lines into shape, dispose of all odd sizes—if necessary, at a loss—and reduce stock to a minimum. Here's what we've done for this year's bargainfest:

MEN'S SUITS.

We've placed on sale this week broken lines of handsome Clay Worsted and Whipcord Suits that were $12, $18, $20 and $25, at $9.50. This is a big loss to us, but we put a price on them to close them out quick. These are cut in single-breasted Sacks, Three-button Cutaways, and Prince Albert Frocks. Sizes are mostly 35, 34, 35, 39, 40, 42 and 44.

We've also Homespuns, Cheviots, Cassimeres, and other summer fabrics, that were $12, $13.50, and $15 a suit, we've made $9.50.

"So He Giveth His Beloved Sleep."

He sees when their footsteps falter,
When their heart grows weak and faint,
He marks when their strength is failing,
And listens to every complaint;
He bids them rest for a season,
For the pathway has grown too steep
And, folded in fair green pastures,
He giveth His loved ones sleep.

Like weary and worn-out children
That sigh for the daylight's close,
He knows that they oft are longing
For home and its sweet repose;
So he calls them in from their labor
Ere the shadows around them creep,
And silently watching o'er them,
He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it, oh, so gently,
As a mother will hush to rest
The babe that she softly pillows
So tenderly on her breast.
Forgotten are now the trials
And sorrows that make them weep,
For with many a soothing promise,
He giveth His loved ones sleep.

He giveth it—friends the dearest
Can never this boon bestow,
But He touches the drooping eyelids
And placid the features grow;
Their foes may gather about them
And storms may around them sweep,
But guarding them safe from danger,
He giveth His loved ones sleep.

All dread of the distant future,
All fears that oppress to-day,
Like mists that clear in the sunlight
Have noiselessly passed away;
No calls nor clamours can rouse them
From slumber so pure and deep,
For only His voice can wake them,
Who giveth His loved ones sleep.

Weep not that their toils are over,
Weep not that their race is run;
God grant we may rest as calmly
When our work like theirs is done;
Till then we would yield with gladness
Our treasures to Him to keep,
And rejoice in the sweet assurance,
He giveth His loved ones sleep.

LUCK.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

About 2 o'clock I overtook a heavily laden wagon, drawn by six powerful horses. The sun's rays were uncomfortably warm, the road was dusty. Just ahead was the watering trough, where the strangers overtook me so long ago.

The driver of the team ahead was a stalwart six-footer. He wore a blond beard and a slouch hat, and walked beside the wheelers. He had a blacksnake looped about his shoulders, and every now and then spoke encouragingly to the straining animals. As we reached the trough I drew rein beside him. He eased the horses back from a heavy pull, and answered my salutation pleasantly. Something in the man's face struck me as familiar.

He watered his team, then climbed upon the wagon-box, produced a flask, and invited me to "smile" with him. I returned the compliment with a cigar, and we entered into conversation. I inquired if he knew what had become of the old man Brown, who kept a stopping-place over on the divide years ago.

He looked at me keenly a moment. "Oh, yes. The old buzzard kicked the bucket some time ago. Struck a good mine and couldn't stand prosperity. Took her down to 'Frisco and put her to school. What's become of the girl? Blanked if I know. Seemed to me I did hear she married Tom Stewart, Brown's old partner, but he's gone up the flume too, I hear. Old place is gone to rack; nobody lives there now. Good stopping place about a mile the other side, though. Stan' up, Bell!"

The handsome gray mare in the "off lead" arched her neck, the other horses tossed their heads and straightened their traces, the blacksnake gave a resounding crack in close proximity to the big "near wheeler's" heels, and the outfit moved on up the mountain.

I rode on ahead, no longer puzzled as to where I had met the stalwart driver, for memory straightway carried me back to my acquaintance of fourteen years before, who had so unceremoniously deserted me that memorable night at old man Brown's. He had changed but little, while I, who was but a boy then, was now bearded and bronzed, and had no fear of being recognized.

I rode on, musing on the ups and downs of life, and presently reached the crossroad. I found the old hostility a heap of ruins, the roof having been crushed in some previous winter by the weight of snow. I unsaddled my horse and allowed him to graze for a time, while I wondered as to the whereabouts of the red-haired lassie who had played such a fearless game that night, and reflected that by this time she was probably dealing faro in some of the underground palaces of San Francisco.

After drifting aimlessly around among the mining towns of the Sierras for some weeks, I went to San Francisco, and I spent some time in noting the changes time had wrought in that queenly city by the sea. One day while strolling on the beach by the Cliff House, I came face to face with a beautiful woman who both interested and puzzled me. She was tall and well formed, with fine brown eyes, and a heavy coil of dark auburn hair. She was dressed in black, plainly but with much distinction, and had every indication of wealth and refinement. She was accompanied by an elderly woman whom I heard her address as "auntie." I managed to pass and repass them several times, and fancied the brown eyes glanced at me rather interestedly.

Without being obtrusive I kept them in sight, and returned to the city on the same train. I secured a seat just behind them, and devoted myself to studying her every detail of dress and manner. Arrived at the depot, they entered a cab, and were driven away, and I returned to the hotel, more interested then I cared to confess. For years I had been so devoted to my mother, and to business, that no thought of marriage had seriously entered my mind. Now I suddenly realized that gray hairs were creeping among the black, and if I ever intended to marry it was high time I gave the matter my attention. How much the thought of a pair of brown eyes had to do with this resolution I cannot say.

For several days I wandered around the various places of amusement and interest with a vague hope of meeting her again. One evening I strolled into the opera house, and stood near the door where I could observe all who entered. My patience was rewarded, for the two ladies came in just before the curtain rose. As she passed me, I fancied I saw again a look of interest in her eyes. I procured a seat as near her as possible, and watched her all the evening, falling more hopelessly in love each moment, and this without knowing if she were married or single.

At the close of the performance, I managed to keep very near them. As they passed me, my brown-eyed beauty dropped her fan. I sprang forward, picked it up, and presented it with the most gracious bow at my command. She thanked me most graciously, and passed on and entered a carriage, leaving me in a state of bliss bordering upon imbecility.

A week passed without seeing her, though I haunted the principal thoroughfares by day and the theaters by night. I was beginning to despair, when strolling through the conservatory at Golden Gate Park one day, I again met her, accompanied by the elderly lady. They were examining some rare orchids. When her eyes met mine, I distinctly saw a pink flush steal over her lovely face, and fancied I saw a smile in the brown eyes, but she bent over a flower, and I passed on, mentally cursing my luck at my inability to obtain an introduction.

They soon passed out and took a shady seat in the park. I sat as near as possible without being obtrusive, and taking out a paper, pretended to read. In reality, I watched her over the top. Presently they arose and passed on, and I saw with a thrill of delight that my divinity had left her portmonnaie on the seat. Instantly a spirit of covertousness took possession of me. I must have the purse at all hazards. I immediately rose and appropriated it, dreading lest I should be seen, and passed into another part of the park, feeling delightfully guilty. Arrived at a place free from observation, I examined my treasure. It contained a twenty-dollar gold piece, some silver, and a few cards and memoranda. On one of the cards was written a name and address, "Jessie E. Stewart, No. 231—Street."

I felt elated. I had heard her companion address her as Jessie, that day in the conservatory. I determined to wait till next day, call at the address, and return the property.

In the next morning's paper I saw an advertisement of the lost purse, with a request that the finder would return it to the same address as that on the card and receive reward.

I wonder if I shall receive the reward I so much desired—an acquaintance with her—and determined to return it that morning.

About 10 I rang the bell of a pretty cottage in the prettiest residence portion of the city. A neat servant maid answered my ring. I asked for the lady who advertised a lost purse, "Ah, yes," said she. "Step into the library. She will be down in a moment."

She ushered me into a lovely little room and ran upstairs, leaving me staring stupidly at a life-size portrait of my sister Alice, which hung on the opposite wall. In an instant it all flashed across me. The resemblance to some one I had met puzzled me no longer. I saw as in a dream the low-ceiled room in the old house in the Sierras, the rough faces of the miners, the eager eyes of the young girl as she sat there playing for my life.

As I gazed at the picture a light step sounded behind me, and turning, I stood before the woman I had been following for weeks, to find in her the heroine of my early California experience.

She laughed musically and held out her hand.

"Ah, Mr. Elliot, I see you recognize me through your sister's portrait. Now, my memory is far better than yours, for I recognized you the day I saw you at the Cliff House. Have I, then, changed so very much since that night? Let me see, it was fourteen years ago, was is not?"

I seized both her hands in an impulsive clasp. Though I remembered her as

A thin slip of a girl like a new moon,
Sure to be rounded into beauty soon,

I had no idea she would develop into such a beautiful woman as this.

"Changed? Yes. You have changed very much, but it is strange I did not recognize you. I ought to have done so."

"There is nothing strange about it. I have changed very much—for the better, I hope. I have had a strange story. Sit down and let me tell it to you."

I did most willingly, and then she went on:

"In the first place I am not old man Brown's daughter. I know nothing of my parents except that both died of yellow fever in New Orleans, when I was a baby. Mr. and Mrs. Brown adopted me and brought me to California. They built that house and I was brought up there, with no 'advantages' except to lay up an abundant supply of health. I was as wild as a hawk, and almost as fierce, I think.

"When I was ten years old, Mother Brown died. After that I ran completely wild. Father was always good to me, but always let me have my own way to a shocking extent. However, I can say this much—though thrown with a rough crowd, I was always treated with the utmost respect. I sometimes think they were a trifle afraid of my ungovernable temper—don't be alarmed; it has been under control for many years now."

"The year after you were there, Father Brown had the luck to strike rich gravel in land that he owned. He took in a partner, Mr. Stewart, and at once brought me down here and put me to school. What a time I had at first! I was like a caged hawk. I know I gave my poor teachers no end of trouble, but they were kind, and I soon began to take an interest. Besides, I always kept that picture you gave me, and I know the sight of her sweet face somehow kept my feet in the path of duty. I became very much attached to one of my teachers, Miss Ross. She is the one with whom you have seen me.

"Father Brown died the year after I was put in school, leaving me in care of his partner, Mr. Stewart. When I was old enough to leave school I had no home, so Mr. Stewart kindly got me out of that difficulty by marrying me.

"He was very kind to me, and I missed him greatly when he died. I induced Miss Ross to make her home with me, and she has been with me ever since. We travelled a great deal for some years, and have not been here very long. I have often thought that I should meet you again. The picture you gave me has been a great comfort to me. When I grew restless and discouraged at school I always fancied her sweet eyes looked at me reproachfully, and when I had won an unusually hard battle with myself, I seemed to read commendation in them. I had it enlarged, as you see, and you don't know what a comfort it has been to me."

My heart was almost too full for utterance. Sweet little Alice! How glad she would have been to know that her pictured face had been so precious to a struggling sister. I told her gently of Alice's death, shortly after my return home, and how anxious she had been to write to her.

Mrs. Stewart was much affected, and to give her time to recover, I related the principal events that had taken place with me since I last saw her. We spent a long time in conversation—to me the most interesting one I ever held. She insisted that I should stay to lunch, and brought Miss Ross to entertain me while she superintended the same. When I finally left it was with a promise to call the next evening.

Of course I did so, and found her more charming than ever. Before long it seemed that I only lived from one time of seeing her until the next. I was wildly, hopelessly in love, and though she was kindness itself to me, there was always an indescribable something in her manner that checked the words I would have liked to utter.

When away from her I cursed myself for a fool, and braced up with all the rusty old saws about the faint hearts and fair ladies, but when again in her presence the fear of what a refusal might mean tied my tongue.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE FROG'S PARTY.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER III.

The king blew again on his whistle, and the frogs gave grave attention. "Who will run a race," said the king, "with our guest, the magically initiated Boy Mortal?" Twenty-seven of the strongest and swiftest runners leaped from their seats, and immediately we all arose from the table. Those of us who were to take part in the race formed quickly at the starting point,

Some of them forgot and began to jump.

and at a word from the king we were off. Frogs, when it comes to running, are by no means very speedy, and in their excitement, because I was gaining so fast, some of them forgot and began to jump. Of course with those who jumped I was nowhere, but with the runners I came in far ahead. The jumpers, on account of taking unfair advantage, were obliged to forfeit all claims to the race.

Felinus told the king that the Boy Mortal was able to get to the queen's palace gate, five miles away, as soon as his fastest jumpers.

It seemed that every frog prince, princess, count, duke, gardener, or glove washer wanted to enter this race.

Felinus said all should have a fair chance and might have one jump before I started.

At the word all jumped a jump of nearly fifty feet, and while they were in the air Felinus said, "Drop on me quick and hold on."

Of course the instant he spread his wings we were both invisible, and the way we flew over those frogs' heads made them seem almost as if they were standing still. When the frogs commenced to arrive, there I sat, and Felinus was calmly washing his face with his right hand.

Weren't those frogs surprised? Well, you can guess they did not believe their eyes, anyhow, until Felinus spoke and said he was getting somewhat tired of waiting and guessed we would go back and bid farewell to the king and the rest of the party. "If you will hurry back," said Felinus, "we will eat one of your fern fruits and wait there till you come. All promised rather shamefacedly to get back as soon as they could, and when they again arrived at the scene of the banquet we were chatting with the king and the guests and eating some of the fern fruits.

After about five minutes of pleasant social time Felinus and I said goodby, and the two most beautiful royal frog ladies offered us their arms and escorted us beyond the the hedge.

The high chief usher stood at the cat 'o nine tail gateway to bow with his hand on his heart, and his frogship's most excellent trumpeter proclaimed in very loud tones.

All the frogs
And pollywogs
Ask you to came again.
THE END.

CORN BALL TREES.

The fairies told me that I was entirely welcome to any of the fruit, berries, or other good things which I wanted to eat or drink in Fairyland, but that it would never do to carry any of these into the outside world, as it would cause people to ask questions, and I could not keep secret the matter of my visits to them.

That is how it came about that the corn ball trees gave me so much trouble. When we make corn balls, you know how sticky it will be before the sugar or molasses is boiled sufficiently, and how molasses candy that is not quite done is so soft and sticky that even butter will not prevent it from clinging to your hands. You might say that this is because the candy is not ripe enough—it needs to boil a little longer. Well, Felinus had told me that green fruit in Fairyland was no better than it was anywhere else and had shown me a ripe corn ball which grew on one of the trees in the queen's orchard.

Sometimes a ripe corn ball on the most thrifty trees in Fairyland will be as large as a man's head, and they always burst open in leaves about a quarter of an inch thick. This causes a really ripe fairy corn ball, when looked at from a distance, to appear like a giant rose. The leaves break off very much like thin corn cakes, but they are finer and better flavored. When ripe, they do not stick to your hands and are delightful to the taste.

Of course I was a boy at that time, and fruit was fruit if it looked fit to eat. Then, too, whether it was ripe or not, I was apt to eat it. So, as we flew past one of the corn ball trees, I reached out and picked a ball about the size of an apple. It looked all right, and although Felinus had warned me not to touch them until they were fully ripe, still I thought that it was too bad to wait three weeks longer. The corn ball was about as hard as a green apple and did not stick to my hands at all, but the minute I took a good bite and it became warm in my mouth you ought to have seen the fun begin.

Of course no boy wants a small bite of corn ball or anything else.

Well, the way that corn ball stuck to my teeth would shame the stickiest pitch you ever saw. It would have been fun for you to have seen me work. First, it fastened my teeth together so that it was hard to open my mouth. Then the half ripe corn ball would string from upper to lower teeth, not leaving either, and I would pull and work and try to chew. Felinus mistrusted that something was the matter and was just about to light on the opposite side of Frog river, when, by using both hands, I got the corn ball to let go of my lower teeth. Meanwhile I had let go of Felinus, and plump I fell into the water. It was not deep enough to drown me, but there was no fun getting wet just as I was going to visit the fairies.

Well, after I had waded out of the river and sat down on the bank Felinus folded his wings and sat down beside me. Didn't he just laugh, though! It would have done you good to have seen him, he looked so happy and amused. There he sat on his hind legs hugging his sides for dear life. He laughed till the tears ran down his cheeks. 'Tis funny and very unusual to see a cat laugh, so Felinus did not provoke me very much. As soon as Felinus could speak he said, "That reminds me of how you played it on Towser last winter."

Now, although the green corn ball did not taste so good as it might, still seeing Felinus laugh so heartily made me feel better, and after I had struggled a few minutes more it finally came out of my mouth and stuck to my hands. "What do you know about Towser and green corn balls?" said I.

"Oh," said Felinus, "I watched you long before you ever saw me; I had my wings spread so you couldn't see me, but I saw you when you took the molasses candy which was not boiled enough and when you tossed a ball of it to old Towser. You had given him some meat and pieces of cracker for his dinner, and he caught the candy just as he would a dainty bone. I saw it all, and thought that some time you might know how it was yourself."

You see this was how it happened. Mother was making some molasses candy and of course I didn't want to wait until it was done, for it seemed as though it took it an age to boil and get ripe. I had brought in a dish of snow, and when mother told me to keep stirring the candy and put a little in the snow to see if it was hard enough I didn't take any little teaspoonful, you can guess, but just picked up a gill dipper. I intended to have a good-sized piece without waiting for ceremonies.

Well, 'twasn't hard; that was what ailed it, so as I had just been giving old Towser his dinner, and he was great on catching in his mouth anything that you threw to him. I rolled up the molasses candy into a piece about as big as a small-sized egg, and I said to Towser, said I, "Hi, Towser, old boy;

Felinus folded his wings and sat down beside me.

catch it, Towser." The next moment it dropped into his mouth. Well, you ought to have seen the time Towser had. It was just about like the time I had with the green corn balls. I couldn't help thinking that when it came to green corn balls or green molasses candy it is better not to take too big a bite of either. When they are fully ripe, however, as old Toby Hill used to say, "The healthiest yarb that grows."

A GENUINE LOVE STORY.

A young clergyman and his wife were invited guests at a large party given by a wealthy parishioner. In all the freshness and elegance of her bridal wardrobe the young wife shone among the throng, distinguished by her comeliness, vivacity and rich attire; and when during the evening her young husband drew her aside and whispered to her that she was the most beautiful woman in all the company, and that his heart was bursting with pride and love for her, she thought herself the happiest wife in the world. Ten years later the same husband and wife were guests at the same house, where was gathered a similar gay company. The wife of ten years wore the same dress she had worn on the previous occasion; of course it had been altered and made over, and was old-fashioned and shabby. Toil and care and motherhood and pinched circumstances had taken the roses out of the cheeks and the little spring out of her form. She sat apart from the crowd looking careworn and preoccupied. Her small hands, roughened with coarse toil, were ungloved, for the minister's salary was painfully small. A little apart the ten years husband stood and looked at his wife, and as he observed her faded dress and her weary attitude, a great sense of all her patient, loving faithfulness came over his heart. Looking up she caught his earnest gaze and noticed that his eyes were fillen with tears. She rose and went to him, her questioning eyes mutely asking for an explanation of his emotion, and when he tenderly took her hand and placing it on his arm led her away from the crowd and told her how he had been thinking of her as she looked ten years before when she was a bride, and how much more precious she was to him now and how much more beautiful for all her shabby dress and roughened hands, and how he appreciated all her sacrifice and patient toil for him and for their children, a great wave of happiness filled her heart; a light shone in her face that gave it more than its youthful beauty, and in all the company there was not so happy a couple as this husband and wife, their hearts and faces aglow from the flaming up of a pure sentiment that transfigured and ennobled and glorified all the toils and privations they endured.

THE WORLD'S LARGEST OAK.—The citizens of Pemiscot county claim that the largest oak tree in the world stands in one of the forests in their county. Col. George B. Bowles of Affton, St. Louis county, has given the dimensions of this giant of the forest. The tree is described as a "red oak," which some claim is a cross between white and black oaks. The body of the tree is straight, with "a swell" the first eight feet above the ground. It is claimed by woodmen that "swells" on trees are caused by injuries near the ground when the trees are small. The injured portion is grown over, and the growth continues. Col Bowles and his engineer measured the body of the tree and found that it is 60 feet to the first limb, which is larger than any of the trees in the forests surrounding. The body of the tree, above the "swell," eight feet above the ground, is 76 inches in diameter. The circumference near the ground is 27 feet. The branches of the tree are numerous and long, giving the tree a top-heavy appearance. Col. Bowles and his engineer estimated that the body of the tree, below the first limb, will produce 11,000 feet of lumber, besides slabs and trimmings.—St. Louis Post.

"Isaac," said the arithmetic teacher, "you always get your addition wrong. Why don't you try to do better?" "It ain't my fault," sobbed little Isaac. "Me fadder told me always to put on ten per cent extra, vatever anything came to."—Harper's Bazar.

The Journal.

FRIDAY EVENING, AUGUST 21, 1896.

A STATE convention of the sound money Democrats has been called for next Tuesday at 11 a. m., in Horticultural Hall, Boston.

THERE is apparently a lack of filial devotion on the part of young Sewell of Maine, who is on the stump attempting to have his father "turned down."

WITH all the attempts on the part of the Bryan people to boom silver, it reached low tide on the New York stock exchange Monday, 66⅞, the lowest price this year.

THE call for the Republican state caucuses has been issued by the state committee, and they are to be held on either Wednesday or Thursday, the 16th or 17th of September.

W. MURRAY CRANE has been found to be all right on the labor question, and now the A. P. A. element announces that it has nothing against him. Mr. Crane seems to be holding his own pretty well.

IF SO be that Mr. Bryan judges of the success of his New York speech last week by what even his own papers say of it, he must look upon that evening before the morning after with anything but satisfaction.

THE reply of Burke Cockran to Mr. Bryan at New York Tuesday night filled Madison Square Garden with a crowd of some 18,000 persons, in marked contrast to the event of the week before. Prominent Democrats from all parts of the country were present, and there was no lack of enthusiasm.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S prompt dismissal from West Point military academy of two cadets found guilty of hazing will meet with hearty approval in all sections. His statement that he will refuse relief to those who "indulge in the brutal and cowardly treatment of beginners, commonly called hazing," shows a deep contempt for the practice.

THE "Samuel E. Winslow campaign committee" of Worcester has bountifully supplied residents of this section with blotters bearing Mr. Winslow's portrait and announcing his candidacy for the lieutenant-governorship. As a means of bringing Mr. Winslow's desires before the people the scheme may be a good one, but as an edifying example of dignified political methods it will hardly take first prize.

CHARITABLY inclined people can find no better use for a few dollars than in helping along the work of the Boston "Fresh Air Fund," which is used to send mothers and children into the country and to the seashore. The amount of good which even a little sum will accomplish can hardly be conceived of by those who have no knowledge of the matter. Every dollar helps to extend the good work, and contributions of any amount will be greatfully received by Rev. D. A. Waldron, 7a Beacon street.

DR. NANSEN has returned from his Arctic exploring trip, safe and sound. He didn't succeed in getting to the North Pole, but he got within 250 miles of it, which is 195 miles further north than any of his predecessors succeeded in getting. Nansen found that his theory that he could drift to the pole with the ice was entirely wrong, the wind having much to do with the ice drift. After getting further north than any other ship or any other man had ever been, he left his vessel in an utterly unknown sea and with two dogs and one companion made an attempt to reach the pole. He suffered severely, and only by extreme good fortune was able to return.

"'And what good ever came of it?'
Quoth little Peterkin.
'That I cannot tell,' said he,
But 'twas a famous victory.'"

THE NEW REPRESENTATIVE DISTRICTS.

The county commissioners announced on Tuesday the representative districts for the next ten years, as rearranged by them, and the results is given below. There are nine of the new districts, instead of ten, as during the past decade, and four double districts instead of three. From being number 10, the eastern end of the county is now made the first district, Palmer, Monson, Brimfield, Wales and Holland comprising it. The second district is considerable elongated and somewhat pipe-shaped, with Ludlow, Wilbraham and Hampden as the bowl, East Longmeadow, Longmeadow, Agawam, Southwick, and Granville for the stem, and Tolland comprising the mouth-piece. It stretches three-quarters of the way across the county, but as it is made up of agriculture communities whose interests are common, it is a much better arrangement than hitching any of the towns to a city. The greatest kick will probably come from West Springfield, whose voters were terribly in earnest regarding a release from Westfield, by whom they claimed they were universally unfairly treated. The new and old districts are:

The annual report of the Boston and Albany railroad for the fiscal year ending June 30 shows that in spite of the general business depression more freight and passengers have been carried than in the previous year. The number of passengers carried was 12,788,327, against 12,151,670 the previous year, and tons of freight carried being 4,122,412 to 3,994,340 the year before. The gross receipts amounted to $9,350,632, against $9,130,869 in 1895. Expenditures were increased from $332,504 to $6,911,865. A net income is left to meet all charges and pay the regular 8 per cent dividend, and then a surplus of $22,786 will be left. During the year $686,624 was expended in eliminating grade crossings at Newton, Natick and other places.

Another hurricane raged about St. Louis, Mo., Saturday night, destroying hundreds of trees, fences, cornfields, and unroofing many houses. This was followed by a cloudburst which devastated a district a mile wide.

A terrific rain storm swept over the territory about Des Moines, Ia., Sunday evening, causing much damage to property. One and one-half inches of rain fell in 10 minutes.

The new United States cruiser Brooklyn was inspected by the naval examining board Thursday, and will have her trial trip Saturday morning.

A public spirited woman of Waterbury Ct., has donated 17 acres of land to the city to have the same developed into a public park.

Strikers in Lynn attacked a party of non-union men coming from work Thursday evening, and severely injured one man.

A GLADSOME CAMPING PARTY.

Gay Times at Forest Lake, Where Half a Hundred Young People are in Camp.

During the summer months people like to forsake the busy town, with its hot and dusty streets exposed to the burning rays of the sun; they like to leave their busy, pressing cares for a short time and spend a vacation at the seashore or some other place of resort. Many prefer to spend an outing at a pond or lake where pleasures such as boating, bathing, etc., which cannot be obtained at home, may be enjoyed, and where quiet, stillness and comfort can be found.

Forest Lake is just such a place. Exceptional advantages and opportunities for an outing or for camp life are afforded here. There is a large pond whose waters are always rippled by cool and gentle breezes; there are shady woods, beautiful groves with secluded nooks where one may go and undisturbed commune with the author of some good book. At present the camping season at Forest Lake is at its height. All the cottages are occupied and others are camping on the shores of the lake. At CAMP COMFORT, OAK POINT, FOREST LAKE.

Camp Comfort on Oak Point are Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Fish, Misses Annie, Carrie and Pearl Fish, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Holbrook, Miss Clara Sexton of Springfield, Henry Holbrook and John Breckenridge. Miss Lou Mortimer of Natick and Mr. E. C. Craig of Boston have been guests at the camp the past week. Camping on the "Isle of Champagne" are Calvin Hastings, Arthur Holbrook, Granger Clark, George S. Holden, and H. M. Dean of Webster. At the Pine Tree camp across the lake are Ned Gardner, Ralph LeGro and Robert Studley. At Florence Cottage are Misses Ola Northrop, Bertha and Bessie Royce, Pearl Lawton and Hattie Flynt, with Mrs. F. A. Royce as chaperon. Miss May Safford, who has been at this cottage, returned to her home in Malden Thursday. At the Wigwam are William E. Breckenridge, F. V. Edgell of Cambridge, F. D. Edgell of Blairstown, N. J., A. E. Peterson of South Manchester, Ct., and Brigham Ball. At the "As You Like It" are Misses Mabel and Nellie Smith, Misses Anna and Effie Shaw, Miss Maud Usher of Plainville, Ct., Miss Genevra Clark of Thorndike, Harry and Albert Shaw, and Freeman Smith. Mrs. H. B. May also spent part of the week at this cottage. At Fairview are Mrs. George O. Henry and son Clifford, Mr. Ross and Mr. Lee of Brooklyn. Clarence Wing occupies the Robber's Roost. At the Idlewild are Miss Jean Richmond of Indian Orchard, Miss Lucy Harden of Hingham, Misses Alice Peabody of Washington, D. C., and Marion Peabody of Reading, Miss Nellie Graves of Northampton, Misses Mina and Gertrude Ball, Misses Clara and Ruth Willis of Waban, Mass., and Miss Addie Rogers of Palmer.

Naturally, where so many young people are together, something of a social nature is constantly under way. During the day much time is spent upon the lake, boating, and as the wind the past week has been rather strong, much enjoyment has been derived from sailing. On these moonlight nights the parties also go out upon the lake, and a ride on such occasions is particularly enjoyable, and in the rippling of the waters against the sides of the boats there is a peculiar fascination. Occasionally, as a boat glides in and out among the shadows cast by the trees along the shore, sweet strains of music from the banjo and harmonica reach the ears of those upon the water. Every night something takes place in the Casino. As a majority of the campers arrived at the lake a week ago last Wednesday, a reception and dance was held on that evening. Thursday evening an advertising party was given; the first prize was won by Miss Bessie Royce and the booby prize was captured by the Edgell brothers. Friday evening an outline party was given, Henry Holbrook taking first prize and Mr. Lee of Brooklyn the second. Saturday evening a leap year german was given under the direction of Miss Addie Rogers. The Casino was handsomely decorated for the occasion with red, white and blue bunting, oak and pine boughs, and a large center piece of hemlock. Twenty-one couples took part in the dancing, and the whole was one of the prettiest gatherings of young people held in town for some time. Music was furnished by Fred Munger and Daniel Grady of Palmer. Monday evening a summer hop was held; Tuesday evening a large bonfire was built on Oak Point, and all the campers gathered about it and sang songs until its glowing embers died out. Wednesday evening a Mother Goose party was given, and Thursday evening another pretty german was held.

This evening the campers on Oak Point are to entertain. The first part of the programme will be held in the Casino, and will be made up of the following parts:

Piano Solo, Miss Fish
Mandolin and Guitar Duet,
Miss Sexton and Miss Carrie Fish
Vocal Solo, Miss Sexton
Dance, Two-step.
Banjo and Banjeaurine Duet,
H. W. Holbrook and Miss Carrie Fish.
Vocal Duet, Miss Sextion and Miss Carrie Fish
Banjo and Piano, Misses Fish
Waltz.
Two-step.

Part second will be a camp fire and corn roast at Camp Comfort, Oak Point, to which all campers are invited.

Another thing which happened this week and must not be forgotten was a ball game between the Cottagers and Campers. Much rivalry as to their ball playing abilities existed, so it was settled on the diamond Tuesday morning. Shaw and Peterson were the battey for the Cottagers, and Breckenridge, Clark and Hastings for the Campers. The Campers were unable to fathom Peterson's elusive curves, and the chocolate and vanilla—the colors of the Cottagers—were victorious, winning 15 to 1. Shaw's batting was the feature of the game.

The majority of the campers will probably leave by the middle of next week, and all will carry with them pleasant remembrances of the good times had at Forest Lake.

Bicycle Tournament Officers.

The following are the officers appointed for the bicycle tournament to be held Labor Day: Referee, G. B. Hayes of Palmer; judges, William Crocker of Monson, C. K. Gamwell and Dr. S. H. Ellery of Palmer; timers, C. W. Johnson, F. H. Caryl and J. F. Holbrook of Palmer; clerk of course, H. W. McGregory of Palmer; assistant clerk, F. O. Sawyer; starter, S. D. Keith of Palmer; announcer, C. W. Johnson; scorers, David Dillon and F. W. Roach of Palmer; umpires, J. A. Clark, E. H. Hopkins, A. B. Cowan and J. P. O'Connor of Palmer.

Knowlton comes very near that time now, and with the track in first-class condition will be likely to clip a few seconds off the record. Men have been at work on the track this week preparing it for the steam roller. The Monson Cornet Band has been engaged to furnish music for the day.

BONDSVILLE GETS THE FIRST

Of the Ball Games With the Thorndikes for the Championship of the Town.

When Shea caught that high fly to center in the last half of the ninth inning, the first game of the series between Thorndike and Bondsville for the championship of the town was ended, and Bondsville had won. A warm rivalry has always existed between teams representing these two villages, and whenever they meet on the diamond a closely contested game,—one that is not won until the last man is out,—is always assured. And last Saturday's game at Thorndike was just such a game. Interesting throughout, though at times loosely played, it turned out at the finish the most exciting seen on the grounds for a long time. Sugrue was in the box for Thorndike and pitched a good game up to the ninth inning, when 7 of the 12 hits were made. Fadgen, on the other hand, was steady throughout. The work of Kennedy at short was of the first class order. Connor was the first man up for Bondsville and was given his base on balls; Bruton hit to Kennedy who threw to Riley, forcing Connor, but Riley threw high to first, and while the ball was being thrown wildly about the bases Bruton scored; Ryan hit safe but was put out at second; Nelson flew out to center. For Thorndike, Kelly struck out; Kennedy was hit with the ball; Kelliher hit to left for two bases, scoring Kennedy; Sugrue went out to center and Sullivan struck out. Score, Bondsville 1, Thorndike 1. In the second and third innings both sides were quickly retired. In the fourth for Bondsville, Nelson struck out; Shea hit safe but was thrown out at second; Fadgen got his base on balls; Moriarty hit to Riley, who fumbled, Conway was given free passage to first. Here was a good chance to score; with three men on bases a hit would have meant several runs, but Sullivan was not equal to the emergency and struck out. In their half Thorndike scored three runs on hits by Sugrue and Chapman, and errors by Connor, Conway and Ryan. Neither side scored in the fifth. In the sixth Fadgen was declared out, hit by a batted ball; Moriarty fouled out to Sullivan; Conway and Sullivan hit safe, but Connor was the third out, Kennedy to Kelliher. Three more runs were added to Thorndike's credit in this inning on a base on balls, errors by Nelson and Connor, and a hit by Kennedy. In the seventh Bondsville scored one on an error by Kelliher and a hit by Ryan; a pretty double play by Kelley and Kelliher prevented further scoring. Thorndike went out in order. In the eighth Bondsville went out in order, Kelliher retiring the side with the assistance of Kennedy and Bordoro. For Thorndike, Bordoro went out, Nelson to Ryan; Riley went out to Ryan; Kennedy flew out to Connor. In the ninth came Thorndike's downfall; Sugrue was hit hard; Sullivan started the fun with a two-bagger; Connor, Bruton, Shea, Fadgen, Moriarty and Conway kept it up with singles, and when the last man was out it was found that six runs had been scored. It was indeed a garrison finish. The score was now 8 to 7 in favor of Bondsville, and excitement was at its highest pitch. Spectators crowded upon the field, delaying the game several minutes. Thorndike's best batters were on deck; could they tie they the score? Amidst great cheering Kelliher came to the bat and hit a fly back of short; Connor and Moriarty collided, and the ball fell safe. Thorndike stock went up. Sugrue went out to Ryan and Kelliher reached third on the play; Sullivan hit to Nelson, who threw Kelliher out at the plate, he trying to score on the hit. A dispute arose over the decision, which only tended to increase the enthusiasm. With Sullivan on second, Chapman came to the bat. A hit would tie the score. In breathless suspense the spectators saw him lift the ball to center, but after sailing majestically through the air it dropped safely to rest in Shea's outstretched hands, and the game was ended. The score:

LIQUOR SELLER CONVICTED.

This Time the Town of Holland Furnishes the Culprit.

Henry Leno, whose place in Holland was raided several weeks ago by Deputy Sheriff Studley, was before the court Monday to answer to the charge of lewd and lascivious cohabitation, and for keeping a common nuisance. On account of lack of evidence he was acquitted of the first charge. In regard to his keeping a common nuisance Officer Studley testified concerning the raid and the finding of the liquor. A Mr. Curtis, who lives about a quarter of a mile from Mr. Leno's place, testified that teams went by his house, the men in them asking of him the way to Henry Leno's; that he had seen these teams stop at Leno's and their occupants enter the house. When they returned some of these parties were intoxicated, while they had passed his house apparently sober. At different times he heard loud singing and talking at Leno's at a very late hour. His wife and Herbert Snow corroborated his testimony. A Mr. Moulton of Stafford gave the most damaging evidence. He said that on two different occasions he had visited Leno's and had brought wine and whisky of Leno himself, and had also paid for the drinks of those who were with him. When asked in what condition he went away he replied that he was not sober, nor by any means was he drunk, but in other words he "felt pretty good." After the commonwealth put in its evidence, Lawyer Kenefick, who appeared for Leno, said that his client wished to offer no teistimony and that he would make no argument. The court found Leno guilty and fined him $100. He appealed and was bound over to the superior court, being required to furnish sureties in the sum of $300.

Thorndike Mills to Run Half Time.

The running time of the Thorndike mills will be reduced to 30 hours a week. The cause of this is the overstocked conditton of the market.

PALMER NEWS.

An Opportunity for Breadmakers.

In the recently-issued premium list of the Eastern Hampden Agricultural Society for its fair next month is an offer which will no doubt attract the attention of many housekeepers. It is an offer of a barrel of flour for the best loaf of bread, and is made by E. B. Taylor, the Holden block grocer. The brand of flour to be used is the White Loaf, 5-pound packages of which Mr. Taylor will furnish for 15 cents. In judging, the quality, size, shape and color are to be considered, and for the best loaf the premium is a barrel of White Loaf flour, with a bag of the same for the second premium. Mrs. J. Stebbins of Brimfield, Mrs. C. Stebbins and Mrs. William Holbrook of Palmer are the judges. There are many good bread makers within the limits of the society, and the exhibit will doubtless be large and attractive.

Trotting Purses for the Fair.

The directors of the Eastern Hampden Agricultural Society held a meeting Tuesday and decided what horse races to have at the annual cattle show next month, and the purses to offer. In addition to the members' trotting class, which is to see which can drive a mile nearest to four minutes, there will be on Tuesday a 2.45 and 2.23 class, with purses of $200 for each. There will also be a 2.50 class for horses owned in Palmer, Monson, Ludlow, Brimfield, Wilbraham, Hampden, Belchertown, Holland, Wales, Ware and Warren; owners are to drive, and the purse is $50, divided $25, $15, $10 and $5. There are numerous 2.50 horses in these towns, and the list of entries should be large and the sport good. The society is a member of the National Trotting Association, and the races will be subject to its rules.

SEVERAL PEOPLE INJURED

By the Overturning of a 'Bus While Returning from a Family Reunion.

The Davis family held a reunion yesterday on Flynt Park with about 75 present. The day was pleasantly spent, but had a most unfortunate ending. A 'bus load of about 20 started to leave the park to take the 4 56 train. The team was driven by Mark Noble, and was going down the avenue which leads to High street when the end of the pole broke. This frightened the horses, and one of them kicked Mr. Noble's foot off the brake. Before he could replace his foot the horses became unmanageable to such an extent that the brake was useless. In turning a corner sharply a wheel broke and the 'bus was overturned. Two or more of the occupants had jumped out previously, and were injured in doing so; others were also hurt. The list of the injured are as follows: Mrs. Morris Cooley of Springfield, rib broken; Mrs. Howard Reynolds, Springfield, face cut so that four stitches were taken, nose badly bruised; Mrs. Benjamin Ladd, shoulder dislocated; Mrs. Elias Johnson, New Canaan, injured at the base of the brain; Carl Johnson, New Canaan, face and hip bruised; Ormal Davis, Granby, leg bruised; Mrs. Ormal Davis and daughter, Mrs. Emory, slightly bruised; L. E. Pease, Springfield, slightly hurt. The injured were quickly removed to a neighboring house and to the Century Hotel, and Drs. Fuller and Jackson were summoned. Every attention possible was paid to the sufferers, who speak in the most grateful terms of the kind treatment they received from the physicians and the people with whom they came in contact. All were able to go home by the evening trains, but the doctors told them that if they waited until to-day they would probably be unable to go.

Anderson—Thayer.

The wedding of Miss Mae Wells Anderson and Charles Sumner Thayer of Amherst at the Methodist church yesterday afternoon was a charming occasion. The church had been tastefully decorated for the event by intimate friends of the bride. The choir gallery was a mass of asparagus and cardinal flower, with plants and bouquets interspersed, while palms and cut flowers were placed about the altar. The pulpit was banked with clematis; in front of the pulpit was an arch of evergreen, dotted with white flowers, and suspended from its center was a horseshoe of clematis bloom. The church was well filled with guests. The bridal party passed to their station in this order, Miss Ella Bills rendering the wedding march: Two ushers, Arthur S. Anderson, brother of the bride, and Charles Ramsay of New London, followed by four flower girls, Misses Minnie and Grace Thayer, neices of the groom, and Hazel Anderson, neice of the bride; the bridesmaids, Misses Blanche and Minnie Anderson, sisters of the bride; the maid of honor, Miss Anna Hazen of East Wallingford, Vt, cousin of the bride, and the bride passed up the north aisle. At the same time Ushers Frank A. Morris and William Smith of Douglas, the best man, Frank Thayer, the groom's brother, and the groom passed up the south aisle. Meeting at the arch the bride and groom took their station under the horseshoe and the ceremony was performed by Rev. James Tufts with a ring. The party passed out of the church by the south aisle, the flower girls strewing the path with blossoms. A reception followed at the home of the bride's parents on Harrison avenue. The couple received congratulations in the parlor standing under a bell of hydrangeas in a bower of green and white, and on a mat of the same. During the reception Miss Ethel Rood and Joseph Chandler rendered piano selections. Many handsome presents were received, including silver, cut glass, pictures, furniture and money. The couple will board for a time, after which they will go to housekeeping.

The ladies of the bridal party were becomingly gowned. The bride wore white silk with trimmings of satin, lace and pearl passementerie, and a tulle veil fastened with flowers. Miss Hazen and Miss Anderson's dresses were fashioned much alike, and were of pink silk and baby-blue silk respectively; each had collarettes of velvet to match the dress, edged with white lace. Miss Minnie Anderson wore heliotrope silk with bows of black velvet ribbon on the shoulders. The Misses Thayer and Hazel Anderson wore white organdie frocks.

The Italians Celebrate.

Last Saturday was a feast day with the Italians, of which there are about 200 in Monson, employes of the W. N. Flynt Granite Co. Although there have been Italian residents for several years, this is the first time any affair of the kind has taken place, and it was with much interest that the townspeople observed the proceedings. The celebration was in honor of Our Lady's Day, a day of which much is made in Italy. The committee of arrangements was comprised of Raffaele Alonzo, Conporti Domenico and Grabielo Costandino. The first named is commonly known as Ralph Allen, and is regarded as the leader in the colony.

About 8 o'clock Saturday morning the company formed in line at the quarry, and escorted by the Chelsea Cadet Band, composed entirely of Italians, and under the flags of the United States and of Italy, marched to St. Patrick's church, where they attended high mass. Early in the morning a discussion arose as to whom should carry the flags, and it was decided that the honor should be bidden off at auction. Vingenzo Sullo and Rocco Auzzie accordingly paid $7 each for it. On their way to the church they stopped at the houses of Michael F. Moore, superintendent of the quarry, George C. Flynt, Mrs. William N. Flynt and Selectman Arthur D. Norcross, where lemonade was served. Returning from the church to the quarry the company disbanded and went to the various Italian houses, where bountiful dinners were served.

In the afternoon a line was again formed and the company marched to Flynt Park. The arrival at the park was the signal for the firing of cannon, fire-crackers, etc. Dancing and sports followed. During the evening there was a fine display of fireworks, representing $258. The band discoursed good music throughout the day and evening, and the Italians may be congratulated upon having had a most successful celebration.

The Italians left six boxes of cigars and a box or two of cigarettes in the quarry tool house Saturday night, and found Monday morning that they had been stolen. They declare that anyone seen smoking "Good Roads," "Brownie" and "Country Gentleman" brands who usually smoke pipes will be closely watched.

A Town Ward at Large.

Lyman E. Rider, for years a ward of the town, left the town farm somewhat unceremoniously Saturday night. He is insane at times, and has on occasions found companionship in an ax which he threatened to put into use if interfered with. His quarters were in an outbuilding, and were thought to be secure, the door and window being covered with heavy wire screens. He wrenched off a shutter however, and with the hinges broke the netting in the door. He is described as about 55 years old, five feet seven inches tall, has a deformed ear, wears a close-cropped beard, and had on when he left a blue and white checked jumper, overalls of the same color, a dark sack coat and a mountain leghorn hat. This is the third time he has escaped; once he was found in Tewksbury, and the other time at North Brookfield.

Bacon—Murphy.

Miss Mary E. Murphy and Fisk G. Bacon were married Tuesday afternoon by Rev. Thomas O'Keefe at the parochial residence at 5 o'clock. The bridesmaid was Miss Kittie Murphy, niece of the bride, and the best man was Dr. Edward Murphy of Quincy, brother of the bride. A reception followed the marriage, at the home of the bride on State street. The house was prettily decorated with nasturtiums and goldenrod. The bride looked very pretty in a gown of white dotted Swiss muslin and tulle veil. The little bridesmaid also wore white. The couple received a number of presents, including a dining room set of furniture, pictures, silver and glass. Upon their return from their wedding journey they will go to housekeeping in Miss Alice E. Darling's house at South Monson.

It is said that Monson baseball cranks object to scores of local games as scored by out-of-town scorers. It is barely possible that the papers would print scores as scored by Monson scorers if any Monson scorers could be found who were capable of scoring a score as it should be scored.

Mr. Tucker is a native of Monson, and with the exception of two years has spent his entire life here.

Monson people regret the departure of John S. O'Brien, who has been a resident of the town for 16 years. Mr. O'Brien was for a number of years associated with his brother Michael in a grain store, but more recently has been employed by James Pendergrast in the People's market. Mr. O'Brien has a position with C. P. Kibbe in Springfield, and has removed his household goods to that city.

The second quarterly conference met at the Methodist church last Saturday afternoon, and was presided over by Elder Thorndike of Springfield. The soliciting committee reported that the sum of $1725 of the $2000 necessary had been raised for church repairs, and the elder authorized the repairs as soon as the money was raised. New windows are among the desired changes, and a suggestion has been made that these might be given as memorials.

The sidewalk from North Wilbraham to Wilbraham for quite a distance is a mass of weeds three feet in height, and utterly useless as a walk. Although taxes are high, it seems as if a few dollars might be expended to put this walk in a walkable condition.

She was a member of the class of '97, Belchertown high school, and was much admired by her classmates, and schoolmates as well. A sister and five brothers survive her. The funeral was held Monday afternoon. The grave was lined with evergreen and flowers, and there were many beautiful floral offerings from friends, members of the high school, and from her Sunday school class. Rev. George J. Newton officiated. Much sympathy is felt for the family in their great bereavement.

ENFIELD.

Death of Joseph Collis.

The death of Joseph Collis, which occurred at his home on the Ware road last Sunday, removed one of the oldest and best known residents of the town. For six months Mr. Collis had been a constant sufferer from a cancer on the arm, and about a fortnight ago he sustained a severe hemorrhage, since which time he sank rapidly until his death. The funeral was held on Tuesday afternoon from his late residence, the services being conducted by Rev. Mr. Ferguson of the Methodist church, consisting of a prayer and ritualistic reading at the house; there were no exercises at the grave. Interment was in Fairview cemetery. The bearers were Henry Collis of Amherst, D. Alonzo Collis of Warren, Fred and Charles Collis of Bondsville. Friends and relatives were present from all parts of the state, among them being Mrs. Luther Collis of Worcester, 79 years of age, who it was feared might not be able to b present.

Mr. Collis was 79 years old, and had resided in Enfield for over 50 years, having spent much of his life as a market gardener. He held a number of offices of trust in the town, among them that of tax collector and selectman. He had been for many years a valued member of the Congregational church. Mr. Collis leaves, besides his widow, two sisters, Mrs. Louisa Moore of North Wilbraham and Mrs. George Smith of Amherst; one son, Myron, of Ware; and two daughters, Mrs. Addison Tucker of Ware and Mrs. Daniel Bolter, who resides on the old homestead. A Polander Dies from the Heat.

A Pole working for C. C. Beebe died of the extreme heat in the field one day last week. He had been in Mr. Beebe's employ but two days. He ate his dinner as usual, and taking a large pitcher of ice water started for the field to work alone, as Mr. Beebe was away, and that was the last time he was seen alive. He did not respond to the repeated calls to supper, and Miss Helen went to the field, but failed to find him. On Mr. Beebe's return about nine o'clock in the evening he made a more thorough search and found him face downward, dead, among the corn which he had been hoeing. He must have died instantly and soon after dinner, as but a few hills of corn had been hoed in the afternoon, and there was no evidence of any struggle where he lay, next to the last hill done. Mr. Beebe notified Selectman Fred W. Green, who sent to Springfield for the medical examiner and an undertaker and then watched in the field till the arrival of the latter some time past midnight, when the body was removed to Springfield.

Was taken with la grippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail, and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use, and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. Since 1878 there have been nine epidemics of dysentery in different parts of the country in which Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy was used with perfect success. Dysentery, when epidemic, is almost as severe and dangerous as Asiatic cholera. Heretofore the best efforts of the most skilled physicians have failed to check its ravages; this remedy, however, has cured the most malignant cases, both of children and adults, and under the most trying conditions, which proves it to be the best medicine in the world for bowel complaints. Monson, Aug. 19, 1896.

My little boy, when two years of age, was taken very ill with bloody flux. I was advised to use Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and luckily procured part of a bottle. I care fully read the directions and gave it accordingly. He was very low, but slowly and surely he began to improve, gradually recovered, and is now as stout and strong as ever. I feel sure it saved his life. I never can praise the Remedy half its worth. I am sorry every one in the world does not know how good it is, as I do.—Mrs. Linda S. Hinton, Grahamsville, Marion Co., Florida. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle, and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. WM. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

LINENS.

You know what we are doing in linens. Out of linen-buying time, when there's almost nothing going on in linen stores, when nobody wants any linens, when there isn't any possible chance to sell linens, we are selling more than ever we've sold in the hight of linen-buying times. There's reason for it, an economical reason, of course.

What other reason could bring it about? Linens are cheap; but that wouldn't sell them in August. They are cheaper than cheap. They are as good as usual, and so low that nobody dreams of getting linens so again this year.

Oh! What a difference in the evening—when a woman has cleaned house all day with Pearline, instead of the old-fashioned way. It's so much easier.

There isn't a thing anywhere about the house (that you'd take water to) but Pearline can save you time and work on it. Saves that wearing rubbing on your paint and wood work, too. And what a difference to everyone in the house when the cleaning is done quickly and easily and without any fuming and fretting! You men ought to get together and insist on Pearline. 413 JAMES PYLE, New York.

One of the Few certainties in treating disease is counter irritation—the effect, usually, of plasters. But Johnson's Belladonna Plaster is more than a mere excitant of the skin; it relieves and cures also by the absorption of its medicinal properties. Hence the sureness and thoroughness of the relief it gives. There are other good plasters, but this is the best. And the best is what we want. The genuine bears the Red Cross. Look for it.

The Busy Mart and Grassy Ways.

I am tired of the city's sounds and sights,
Tired of the glare of the noisy town;
I long for the quiet farmhouse lights
That shine through the trees when the dusk comes down.
I long for the scent of the berry-vines
That over the hedges climb and fall—
For the song and the breath of the wind-blown pines,
And the stars and the darkness over all!

I am tired of the city's sin and strife
Of the bargain mart and the busy maze—
I dream of the dear old country life
Of the blossomed fields and the grassy ways,
And I yearn like a homesick child to steal
To my garret room by the starlight's gleam
In the dear old home of my youth—to kneel,
And pray like a child—and sleep—and dream!
—Madeline S. Bridges, in Ladies' Home Journal.

CAME TOGETHER.

Peculiar things are sometimes told into the ears of Lewiston lawyers. They are a sort of father confessor for certain classes. Thursday afternoon a woman from the country climbed slowly up the stairs of Lyceum hall block and rapped ceremoniously upon the office door of Joel Bean's office. Squire Bean was talking with a farmer who had come in a minute before, and he requested the lady to be seated in the outer office, while he listened to the man's story, told excitedly in the inner room. It was a common place story, and amusing to the lawyer, but not to the man who told it, for he was terribly in earnest.

"No, sir, Susie won't pay no 'tention to anything I say. We've been married nigh on to forty-four years, and we've children of our own grown up and married. The farm down there has my best manhood tilled into it with the plough and harrow, and not a spear of grass grows but it is better for the years of labor I put into it. Our crops wuz not extra fine in them first years, for it was a run out farm, and we wuz poor. But she never complained in them days. She wuz a little thing, but Lord! how she worked! But now she don't give me no comfort at all. And its all because I happen to believe in preadamite men. Do you? She says it's contrary to the Bible and all that. Now I'm a-going to let her get a divorce or I'm a-going to get one myself. She shall have half the property, but she shan't call me a heathen—me who has led the prayermeeting for years, and sez my prayers. I don't believe God made the earth in a million years and then snapped his fingers and sez 'Nebecunezer' backwards, and the man sprung into life from the dust of the street. I'd sooner think he did it 'cording to rule as he'd a orter."

"Reuben!" came a high soprano voice from the other room, and in the door stood Susie, who could not stand it any longer.

Reuben looked surprised, but plucked up courage and coughed.

"The good Lord might a made you from a monkey, but I never wuz. My folks are old New England bluebloods," she said.

The lawyer looked interested, but did not smile. "Be seated, madam, please," he said. "Your home must be a pleasant one. Your husband tells me that you and he have worked long and hard to make it so—in fact, have put your best life's blood into it. Is it so? Yes. And who will live there when you separate? Perhaps some of your neighbors may like to buy it."

The man and woman looked indignantly into each other's faces.

"Neighbors, indeed. There hain't one of 'em got such a farm."

"Oh, well; it will have to be sold, of course. I suppose your children agree to this separation. It won't make them feel bad to see the old farm where they were born sold?"

"I ain't thought of that," murmured the woman.

"Nor I, nuther," said the man.

"And you, too. What will you do? Go and live with them, or will you work out somewhere? Could you do housework, madam?"

The woman's eyes flashed. The man suddenly straightened up and set his teeth. "No wife of mine shall ever work out!" he exclaimed.

Her face softened and the lawyer saw it.

"Did you ever say that before you married her? "She's been a good wife to you all these years! Were you ever sick and has she not cared for you tenderly?"

Tears glistened in the sunken blue eyes and trickled down to his wizened beard. "Who'd take care of you now if you were ill?" pursued the lawyer in a quiet voice.

The woman let down her veil and the farmer said, "I'll come in and see you again," and offering his arm to his wife he tenderly showed her out and helped her into his battered wagon at the door of the block. As they drove down the street there was no room between them for a third person on the seat.—Lewiston, Me., Journal.

A TIMELESS TOWN.—The old proverb says that time was made for slaves. It is certainly true that it was not made for Alsatians, if the following story told by a traveler lately returned from Alsace be true. Says he: "On my return from Belchen, I looked upon the beautiful villages of the Lewen Valley, and being like a tourist who likes to poke his nose into everything, I turned, by chance, into the church at Kirchberg. On coming out I took out my watch to regulate it by the clock in the church tower. But there was no clock to be seen. Hence I went into the village inn, and there asked the time. But my host could not oblige me. 'I can't tell you exactly, for, you see,' he said, 'we have no use for clocks. In the morning we go by the smoke rising from the chimney at the parsonage up on the hill. The parsonage people are very regular. We dine when dinner is ready. At 4 p. m. the whistle of the train coming from Massmunster tells us that the time has come for another meal, and at night we know that it is time to go to bed when it is dark. On Sunday we go to church when the bell rings. Our parson is a very easy-going man, and he doesn't mind beginning half an hour sooner or later."—Harper's Round Table.

THE WORLD'S OLDEST ROSEBUSH.—The oldest rosebush in the world is found at Hildesheim, a small city of Hanover, where it emerges from the subsoil of the church of the cemetery. Its roots are found in the subsoil, and the primitive stem has been dead for a long time; but the new stems have made a passage through a crevice in the wall, and cover almost the entire church with their branches for a width and hight of 40 feet. The age of this tree is interesting both to botanists and gardeners. According to tradition, the Hildesheim rosebush was planted by Charlemagne in 833; and, the church having been burned down in the 11th century, the root continued to grow in the subsoil. Mr. Raener has recently published a book upon this venerable plant, in which he proves that it is at least three centuries of age. It is mentioned in a poem written in 1690, and also in the work of a Jesuit who died in 1673.—Scientific American.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

"So you have been having a pretty dry time out in Kansas?"

"Dry? Well, rather. Why the air was so dry out there that the moon used to fairly raise a dust as it went through the sky and the moisture was all evaporated out of the milky way until it looked like a long trail of pulverized chalk."

"How did you get water for yourselves and stock?"

"Well that was a bad matter. We used to have to run the well through the clothes wringer every morning to get water for cooking, and we would go and throw a lot of little pebbles on the barn to make the horses think it was rain falling on the roof, and in that way keep them from getting discouraged."—Truth.

GIRLS, WRITE YOUR NAME TWICE ALIKE.

"How do you sign your name?" asked one young girl of another, in an "Every Where" story.

"Why, it depends on circumstances. 'Madge,' if I'm writing to you; 'Birdie' to mamma, or—"

"Yes, but I mean formally, to strangers, or on business.

"Haven't any business, and never write to strangers."

"Don't be serious, Madge. I want to save you future trouble."

"Oh, I'm in for a sermon, am I? Go ahead then. What has started you on this tack?"

"You know that fifty dollars Uncle Jack gave me last Christmas? I wasn't ready to use it just then, and put it in the bank for safe keeping. Of course I had to sign my name in a big book, and go through all the formalities of opening an account. Yesterday I wanted the money, so I walked up to the cashier's window with all the dignity I could command, presented my bank-book, signed the little slip that was handed me, and expected to receive my bills immediately. Not one of them! The cashier compared that slip with the book I signed months ago, looked very suspiciously at me, and quietly stated that I would have to be 'identified.' My bewildered 'What for?' elicited the curt information that the signatures didn't correspond! You can imagine how insulted I felt. As if I was trying to steal my own money!"

"Why the very idea! What did you do?"

"Went down to old Mr. Monteith and asked him if he would please come and tell that impudent fellow that I was Mabel Curtis. He put on his hat at once, like the dear old soul that he is, but instead of being indignant, and taking my part, he quietly told me that it was probably my own fault. The cashier was as polite as could be to Mr. Monteith, and allowed him to see both signatures, after being convinced that I was actually an honest person. They talked together a little while, and then Mr. Monteith called me to look at the book. What do you suppose the trouble was?"

"I'm sure I don't know."

"Well, you know what a fad we girls took up last winter for fancy names, and how easily mine adapted itself. So, very naturally, I had written 'May Bell Curtis.' But I was sick of that affectation long ago and dropped it. Feeling in a busines-like mood yesterday, I had signed the slip, 'Mabel C. Curtis,' and to make matters worse, did it in a stiff, angular hand, instead of the gracefully rounded one that went with the poetic name."

"And that caused all the fuss! Why didn't the cashier give you a chance to explain?"

"That is what I asked, but they both laughed, and said any forger could explain a discrepancy, and the bank would soon have to close if it did business that way. The cashier called this 'an aggravated case of a kind to which the feminine mind seems peculiarly prone,' which made me so angry with him that I never want to see him again. But Mr. Monteith took me down to his store and gave me a fatherly lecture."

"Which you want to repeat to me. Well, what did he say?"

"Said he would have refused payment himself on any such 'foolish contradiction' if he hadn't known me all my life. 'But what am I to do?' I asked. 'Must I string "Mabel Carrington Curtis" clear across the page every time I put pen to paper?'"

"'You must have one form of signature, and only one, for all business or formal purposes,' he responded, 'or you may get into serious trouble. Make it brief if you like, but be sure that it indicates your sex. 'M. C. Curtis,' if you stick to it, may serve the purpose, but 'Mabel C. Curtis' is much better. And write it always in the same fashion. Change the appearance of the handwriting in the body of your letters if you must, to be in style, but never in your signature.'"

"What a nuisance! I think it would be dreadfully monotonous."

"It's much worse than monotonous to be arrested on a charge of forgery and kept in the station house over night, as happened to one lady Mr. Monteith told me of. And if I had been a stranger in the city I might have thought monotony preferable to losing my fifty dollars. As for letters, Mr. Monteith told me of so many cases where great inconvenience or loss had been averted by the full name and address being given, and such odd and unexpected complications arisen from their absence, that I think I'll never omit them again."

"Oh, I've heard quantities of such stories, too, but I never paid much attention to them. Well, is the lecture over?"

"Yes; but 'not the moral effect thereof, I hope,' as Professor Martin used to say."

HAD HIS HOPES.—This is the story that Shem told Ham and Japeth as they sat together on the hurricane deck of the ark. Of course the Saunterer, old as he is, was not present; but the story has come down to him. And since it is a good thing he feels that it is his duty, as his young nephew expresses it, to push it along. There was once two Irishmen whose occupation was to carry bricks from the base of a building in process of construction to the workman who was finishing a chimney at the top. As was natural, each of the Irishmen was confident that he was a better man than his fellow, and at last one wagered the other that he could carry him in his hod to the top of the building. The wager was accepted, and Pat climbed into Mike's hod, who immediately began the ascent. The climb was finished without accident, though it must not be omitted that on the sixth ladder Mike's foot slipped a little and for a part of a second things looked dubious. Arrived at the top, Mike sat down his hod. "There," he said triumphantly, "Oi told yez Oi'd do it, and Oi did it, didn't Oi?" "Yez did," returned the other, "yez did, Moike; but there was once Oi had me hopes on th' sixth ladder."—Boston Budget.

A PRACTICAL POSTAL SAVINGS BANK.—A west side man of spendthrift disposition has a scheme by which he uses the government mail as a savings bank. He works down town, is paid his salary every Saturday evening, and it is his custom to "go out" after receiving the money. "Going out" may include all sorts of money-spending, and so this shiftless person, before starting "out," incloses a $5 bill in an envelope and addresses it to himself at his west side place of residence. Last Saturday he had the letter in his hand, and an acquaintance happened to see the address on it. "Well," he said, "that's the first time I ever heard of a man writing to himself. "I'll be mighty glad to get that letter Monday morning. It has $5 in it. I mail it to-night, and we don't have any house delivery until Monday morning, I can't possibly get at it before then. Now, if I'm a blamed fool and get into a poker game or spend all my money settin' 'em up, I'm sure to have a little left on Monday. It's better'n a bank, and a good deal more reliable than loaning it out. I know the money will be returned to me on Monday. Great scheme, eh?"—Chicago Record.

DIDN'T WANT TOO MUCH COMPANY.—Childish ideas of God teem with unique and starling ideas of the Creator, and form the most fascinating chapters in past and present contributions to the world's theology. It is doubtful, however, if the omnipresence of God was ever set forth in more astounding terms than by a little girl during the last week. She had been recently taught that God was always near her and that His all-searching eye took careful note of her every act and thought. This instruction seemed to impress Ethel very deeply, and the mother was confident that the lesson would not soon be forgotten. It was not. Thursday Ethel and her mamma were walking on Michigan avenue, when a dog of uninviting appearance persisted in following them. All efforts to "shoo" him away were unavailing. Finally Ethel turned about and delivered the following charge to the dog, in tones which struck terror to her mother's heart: "Go 'way, you naughty little dog!" exclaimed Ethel. "It's bad 'nough to always have God taggin' round without havin' you!"—Chicago Post.

LUCK.

One night I escorted them to the opera. When we returned it was late, but Jessie, as I always called her to myself, insisted that I should come in. She had been unusually full of spirits that evening, and her gay laughter and sallies of wit had completely enthralled me. Miss Ross said good-night and discreetly left us at the library door.

I had a 'now-or-never" feeling, that caused a peculiar sensation to perambulate up and down my spine. I thought the darkness of the room would be a favorable opportunity, but before I could take the slightest advantage of the situation she turned a flood of gaslight upon the scene, and gave me a tantalizing look that was too much for even my cowardice, and in the next moment I had her in my arms, urging my suit with all my ardor.

But she was obdurate. She broke away from my detaining clasp, and, tossing her wrap upon a chair, cried gleefully: "So you say you love me. Very well, we will let fate decide it. I won you once, fair and square—now see if you can win me. We will play a straight game, just as we did that night long ago, only you shall take Joe's place. If you win, I am yours. If not, I remain single."

She produced a deck of cards and a box of chips, seated herself at a small table, and motioned me to the opposite seat. There was nothing for it but to obey. She divided the chips, and, at a motion from me, dealt. I had long since mastered the intricacies of "freeze-out," and though seldom a lucky player, I resolved to play as never man played before, for who ever played for such a stake!

I had an odd feeling that she would keep her word, and abide by the decision of the cards. We played in silence for a while, she getting the best of the game. I began to bet recklessly in hopes of retrieving my waning fortunes, but luck was now steadily against me.

I fancied I saw a disconcerted look in her eyes when she saw my pile reduced to five. I took heart at this and began to win. We were soon nearly even, when an idea took possession of me. On the next deal, I drew but one card. She took three and the betting began. I went slowly at first, but with a confident air that deceived her. I raised her till she had but three chips left. I calmly pushed in three. She hesitated a moment, then threw down the cards. "Take it!" she said. I quietly gathered in the chips, putting my bobtailed flush out of sight, and saw, as I gathered up the cards, that she had jacks and trays.

With such odds in my favor I began to be very hopeful. I dealt; each drew two. She quietly laid down her last chip, and I called her. She had three queens and a pair of eights. I threw down four treys, and caught her in my arms, claiming my reward. She granted it, fully and freely, but I never told her what a bluff I played.—E. Thurston, in the Overland.

A NEW BUSINESS-LIKE PROPOSAL.

"A good story is told of an English minister, who lived about seventy years ago," said Uncle Drake. "We may call him Smith, and he was a bachelor. He resisted many persuasions to marry, which his friends were constantly making, until he had reached a tolerably ripe age, and he himself began to feel the need of, or at least began to have new ideas of the comfort of being nursed with woman's gentle care. Shortly after entering one of the circuits a maiden lady, also of ripe years, was strongly recommended to him, and his friends again urged that he would better get married, representing that the lady named would not refuse to accept him, notwithstanding his eccentricities.

"'Do you think tho?' said the dominie, for he had a very perceptible lisp. 'Then I'll go and thee her.'

"He was as good as his word. His ring at the door bell was answered by the serving maid. 'Ith Mith P. within?' briskly but calmly asked the lover. 'Yes, sir; will you kindly walk in? 'No, I thank you. Be kind enough to say to Miss P. that I wish to speak to her a moment.'

"Miss P. appeared and repeated the invitation to walk in.

"'No, thank you. I'll thoon explain my bitheth. •I'm the new Methodist preacher. I'm unmarried. My friends think I'd better get married. They recommend you for a wife. Have you any objections?'

"'Why, really, Mr. Sm—'

"'There, don't anther now. Will call thith day week for your reply. Good day.'

"On that day he appeared at the door of Miss P.'s residence. It was promptly opened by the lady herself.

"'Walk in, Mr. Smith.'

"'Can't indeed ma'am. Pleath anther me. Yeth or no?'

"'Well, Mr. Smith, it is a very serious matter. I should not like to get out of the way of Providence—'

"'I perfectly understand you, Miss P. We will be married thith day week. I will call at thith hour. Pleath be ready, ma'am.'

"He called on that day week at that hour. She was ready. They were married and lived happily several years."—Boston Herald

A MAGNIFICENT ORDER.

Among a group of stories about eating, published in the Philadelphia Times, this one by Burr McIntosh is not half bad: In the days before he was an actor man he was in the far West with a lot of swell New Yorkers, who were inspecting a mine. The richest men of the locality gave them what they believed to be a grand blowout—the best the place could provide—and one of them incautiously remarked to one of the metropolitan visitors: "Reckon you couldn't beat this much in the East?" Scornfully replied the New Yorker: "Of course you've done the best you could, but the cost of this feed wouldn't be enough to give a Delmonico waiter a tip." It was a cruel remark, and it sunk deep into the soul of that little western society. Later business summoned the man to whom the words had been spoken and one of his companions to the vortex of eastern civilization, and they determined to go to Delmonico's and paralyze that hostelry with their wealth. To them money meant nothing. They seated themselves in the famous place, prepared to paralyze the rich New Yorkers. A waiter approached and handed them a bill of fare. One of them picked it up with a careless air, as though he had been frequenting Delmonico's every day in his life, and, casting his eye casually over it, suddenly started and exclaimed: "Great heavens, Bill, she's all in French." "Don't lose your nerve," said Bill, coolly. "Do the best you can. Paralyze them." He did. Summoning the waiter with a lordly air, he said: "See here, mister, bring me $40 worth of ham and eggs." The verdict at the coroney's jury upon the waiter is not recorded. The cause of his death was never ascertained. He simply fell dead.

SOAKING CLOTHES.

Before putting clothes in soak remember to remove all stains. Fruit stains and coffee stains may be removed by cold water Iron rust is one of the stains which may be left till after washing, as that does not seem to set it perceptibly. It can be taken out at any time by laying the stain over a board in the hot sun, covering it with salt and saturating it with lemon juice. Slight mildew stains will yield to the same treatment.

A rusty or soiled iron is a very unsatisfactory article to use. All flatirons should be washed at least two or three times a year in warm water in which a tablespoon of lard to the gallon is melted. Wipe them dry and set them in a warm place till every drop of moisture is gone. Irons should be kept in a clean place, away from dust, where it is perfectly dry, but it is a very bad practice to allow them to lie about the stove as some housekeepers do. Standing continually on the stove destroys the temper of the iron, and irons that have lost their temper will not retain their heat one-half as long as those which have been properly cared for.

The best iron holders are those made of cotton bed-ticking. Do not make them too thick. Two layers of wool stitched between two pieces of bed-ticking makes an iron-holder which is thick enough for all practical purposes, and is not too clumsy to be put through the wash. Keep four or five holders in use, and give the ironer a fresh supply for each ironing. Do not wait until the holders are greasy and stiff before they are put through the wash. Everything in connection with the laundry should be kept spotlessly clean. Keep two covers to the ironing board and two ironing sheets, so that a fresh cover and sheet may be had whenever the one in use may be soiled. It is no economy to use old sheets for this purpose. It costs but little to buy heavy unbleached muslin from which to make these sheets. Old sheets are soon ironed into rags when used up in this way, and there are many other ways of utilizing old cotton.—Baltimore Sun.

YOUR LAST OPPORTUNITY.

We advertise that during the month of August we would make all skirts free of charge of goods bought from our silk and dress goods department at 50 cents a yard and over.

While a large number have availed themselves of this offer, we wish that the number was twice as many. This, the last week of August, will be the last opportunity for the ladies of Springfield and vicinity to secure this great saving—unless the continued depression of the tailoring business in New York will admit of low prices in September as August, which is doubtful.

In both these departments new goods are opening up daily from which you can select a skirt fresh from the mill in the latest effects and colorings and have it made free of charge.

Buy your goods and linings, we do the rest.

The "Old Meeting-House."

Upon the hill top's rounded crest naked, and brown, and bare,
Firm and securely founded on its solid granite base,
The fathers' ancient meeting-house uplifts, in crystal air,
Its crude and homely outlines, void of beauty and of grace;
Yet there are those who love it, and the memories it recalls,
And tradition which surrounds it, from the days of long ago,
Which like a flame of glory, decks its time-defaced walls
With a drapery of beauty human skill could ne'er bestow.

To them, the rough-hewn timbers which enter in its frame,
From the massive superstructure to the porches quaint and odd,
Are witnesses forever of the father's zeal and fame,
And their fixed and firm reliance on the promises of God;
And the croonings of the night-winds, through each crevice rare and slim,
Are but the ghosts of melodies—the solemn, sad refrains
Of spirit choirs invisible, who, in its shadows dim,
Still chant their adoration in the old-time minor strains.

Around its sacred precincts, as a center fixed and firm,
Are grouped the township's records through a century of years,
All of ill the fathers suffered, all of glory they could earn,
As Providence dealt with them, in its history appears.
There they worshipped, there they married, and there, when time was o'er,
Their tributes of affections to departed friends were paid,
E'er the living through its portals, in sad procession bore
Their dead, to rest forever in the churchyard's quiet shade.

To the rude and rugged logic of the township's first divine,
Deflected from the sounding board, high o'er the pulpit hung,
As he taught the creeds of Calvin, rule on rule, and line on line,
To his hearers far below him—oft its study rafters rung.
And there the sounding viol, and the cornet's silver tones,
First broke the Sabbath's stillness with melodies profane;
Which the elders heard with horror, and trembled in their bones,
At the sound of other music than the pitch-pipe, wind and rain.

Within its walls, for cycling years, the fathers young and old,
Gathered yearly from their homesteads, in the early spring-time thaws,
When the snows had left the hillsides and the frost had fled the mould,
To elect the village rulers and to regulate their laws.
Alas, for its departed days! Deserted now and still,
The summer winds around it whisper dirges soft and low,
And the demon winds of winter, sweeping down from Rimmon Hill,
In scorn of its long vanished fame, their blatant trumpets blow.

THE RED-HOT DOLLAR

It lacked three minutes of five by the big clock in the tower when the east-bound Chicago express rumbled into the station at Buffalo. The train had not yet come to a standstill when a hatless man jumped from the platform of the rear sleeping-car and ran across the tracks into the depot restaurant. A few minutes later he reappeared, carrying a cup of coffee in one hand and a paper bag in the other.

With these he hurriedly made his way back to the car through a struggling procession of drowsy tourists, who were taking advantage of the train's five minutes' stop to breath the crisp morning air. The last of these had already resumed his seat when the man without a hat again appeared at the lunch room counter, returned the borrowed dishes, and ordered coffee for himself. He had just picked up the cup and was raising it to his lips when the conductor's "All aboard" rang through the station.

Leaving the coffee untouched, he thrust a five-dollar bill at the attendant, grabbed his change, and started in pursuit of the moving train. He had almost reached it when an unlucky stumble sent the coins in his hands rolling in all directions along the floor. Quickly recovering himself and paying no heed to his loss, he redoubled his efforts, and, though losing ground at every step kept up the hopeless chase to the end of the station. There he stopped, panting for breath. The slip had proved fatal. He had missed the train!

As he stood staring wildly through the clouds of dust that arose from the track, a young woman, evidently deeply agitated, suddenly appeared in the doorway of the vanishing car. Upon seeing him she made frantic attempts to leap from the platform when she was seized by a man and pulled back into the car. When the door had closed upon the two the bareheaded man in the station faced about and philosophically muttered:

"It's fate!"

Then, after pausing a few moments, as if to collect his thoughts, he slowly retraced his steps to the scene of his mishap, and began calmly searching for his lost change. Circling closely about, his eyes scanning the floor, he succeeded in recovering first one and then another of the missing coins, until finally, after repeated rounds he lacked only one dollor of the whole amount. At this point he paused, clinked the recovered coins in his hands, looked at his watch, and then started on a final round. As this failed to reveal the missing piece, he gave up the search, transferred the contents of his hands into his trousers' pocket and started in the direction of the telegraph office.

He had proceeded perhaps twenty paces when it occurred to him to turn about and cast one more look about the floor. As he did so his eyes fell upon a shining object lodged in an opening between the rail and planked floor, a few feet from where he stood. He stooped to examine it, and, seeing that it was the missing coin, reached for it, but found the opening too narrow to admit his fingers. He tried to recover the piece with his pocket knife, and failing in this attempt, took his lead-pencil, with which, after repeated attempts, he succeeded in tossing it upon the floor.

With an air of subdued satisfaction he walked away, and was about to convey the coin to his pocket when a sudden impulse lead him to examine it. Holding it up before his eyes, he stopped, scrutinized every detail, and as he turned it over and over the puzzled look on his face changed to one of rigid astonishment. For fully a minute he stood as if transfixed; then rousing himself and looking anxiously about as if to see if any one had observed him, he hurried to the cashier's desk in the restaurant, and, producing the bright silver dollar, asked the girl if she happened to remember from whom she received it.

She didn't remember, but would exchange it for another, she said, if he wished. Politely declining the offer and apologizing for having troubled her, he said that, as the coin he held in his hand was separating a loving wife from her husband, he wished very much to find some trace of its former owner. The girl looked up, thought for a moment, then, pulling out the cash drawer and examining its contents, said she might have received it from the conductor of the Lake Shore express which had left for Cleveland at 3.15. She now recalled that when she came on duty at midnight there was no silver dollar among the change in the cash drawer, and that the only one she remembered receiving was from sleeping car conductor Parkins.

The man thanked her and hastened to the telegraph office, where he sent this message:

"Conductor, East Bound Chicago Express,
Utica, N. Y.

Please ask lady in section seven of the sleeping car Catawba to await her husband at Delavan House, Albany. A. J. HOBART."

After requesting the operator to kindly rush the dispatch, he proceeded to the ticket office, procured a seat in the 5.45 fast mail for Cleveland, and with his eyes fixed upon the floor, meditatively paced up and down the platform, waiting for the train to arrive.

As he did so he was disconcerted to find himself the object of widespread curiosity; even the newsboys with the morning papers favored him with an inquiring stare as they passed. Wondering what was amiss, he suddenly put his hand to his head, which furnished an instant explanation He was hatless.

Looking at the big clock he saw that it lacked ten minutes of train time, and, hastily crossing over to the further track, he disappeared through the west end of the station.

Among the passengers who boarded the 5.45 fast train for Cleveland when it thundered into the station, ten minutes later, was the bareheaded gentleman of a few minutes ago, now wearing a stylish derby. Once in the train, he settled himself in his seat with a sigh of relief and satisfaction. Not until then did the really remarkable character of the situation dawn upon him. On the day which he hailed as the happiest of his life he was traveling at the rate of about sixty miles an hour away from the girl he loved devotedly and to whom he had been married just seventeen hours. A queer opening of his honeymoon! In his anxiety to get a cup of coffee for his wife, he had lost his hat, then lost his change, and, lastly, lost the train.

Why did he not follow his bride at once? What mysterious spell had come upon this seventeen-hour bridegroom that he should fly from her as swiftly as the fast express could carry him? His hand held the solution of the problem—simple yet unexplainable—a silver dollar! It held the secret he must unravel before he could return to her; it was not that he loved her less, but that this bit of precious metal had suddenly developed an occult power that had turned their paths, for the present, in opposite directions.

At the first stopping place he sent another message, which read as follows:—

"Mrs. A. J. Hobart, Delavan House, Albany, N. Y. Cannot possibly reach Albany before to-morrow morning. Ansel."

With his brain filled with excited thoughts, the young man entered the sleeping car office at Cleveland four hours later and asked for Conductor Parkins. He was told that this official would not be on duty before night, though possibly he might be at his home on St. Clair street.

To the address given him the indefatigable young man repaired at once, and found the genial gentleman for whom he sought, breakfasting with his family. He kindly gave audience at once to his visitor.

"This coin which you gave the cashier of the restaurant in Buffalo," said the latter, revealing it in the palm of his hand; "can you tell me from whom you received it?"

Parkins remembered receiving cash from but two passengers the night before, one a traveling man who got off at Cleveland, and the other whose destination was Erie. The stranger might ascertain their names by consulting the car diagram at the ticket office. "You seem interested in the coin," he added, smiling.

"I am, for a good reason," laughed the young man in reply. "It is separating a man from his wife." And with these enigmatical words he made his adieu, with thanks, hastened to the ticket office, and an hour later was scouring the city for one Richard Spears.

The register of the Stillman House contained the freshly written name of "Richard Spears, Providence, R. I.," but that gentleman, when found in his room showing samples of hardware to a prospective buyer, regretted that he could not throw any light on the particular dollar his visitor held up to his gaze, and remembered distinctly that he had given the conductor a two dollar bill in payment for his berth. He came from a section, he said, where people took no stock in silver dollars.

It was three o'clock in the afternoon when a man got off the train at Erie and inquired of a cabman and depot master regarding a lady who had arrived on the train from Buffalo. An hour later he was driving along a country road some miles south of the town inquiring for the Wickliffe farm.

As he finally drove up to the house which was his destination he was conscious of a strange excitement. This, he realized, was probably his only remaining chance to trace the coin by whose mysterious power he had been drawn into this wild chase with the hope of identifying its former owner. He took a hasty note of the general features of the place. It had a comfortable, well-to-do look; a two-story house, white, with green blinds. Most of these were closed, as is customary with country houses, but the windows at the right of the big front door, opening on a small porch, were shaded only by white curtains. There was no sound of voices within as he stepped to the door and rapped.

Mrs. Wickliffe, a pleasant-faced little woman, sat surrounded by three children and a neighbor's wife, to whom she was displaying some purchases. As one of the children opened the door, admitting the stranger into this animated scene, she was standing before a mirror trying on a new bonnet, which was eliciting extravagant praise from the neighbor.

After listening to his story, Mrs. Wickliffe said that her memory was so treacherous that she really couldn't say for certain whether or not she gave the conductor the shining dollar, but that if she did she must have received it from her son in Germantown, Pa., from a visit to whom she had just returned and who before her departure had exchanged some money for her. She added that, as she took no interest in coin collecting, a dollar was simply a dollar to her, and that she thought a woman was very foolish to take up with a fad which might ruin her happiness.

Her unknown caller thought so too, admired her taste in millinery, took the address of her son, and clutching the fatal coin more firmly than ever, drove back to Erie, where he boarded the New York night express.

To the young man who still clutched the silver dollar sleep was impossible. A multitude of exciting fancies crossed his brain. The developments he hoped to bring about, the curious solution of the problem, its effects upon his future, and the future of one so dear to him,—all this murdered sleep for him as effectually as did the crime on Lady Macbeth's soul. It drove him into the smoking car, where he sank into a seat and planned and conjectured between puffs

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

DOT, THE CHIMNEY SWEEP.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER I.

In the bad old days when barons ruled the land and when robbers and robber barons were everywhere fighting and robbing their neighbors, their lived in a village near the Black Forest a man named Rolph, who, unlike many of his neighbors, was peaceable, just, and constantly trying to help the people of his village.

He had one son, a boy of nine years, who like his father, was kind-hearted and truthful. He was so small that his parents gave him the pet name of Dot.

Far to the east there lived in the Black Forest a very quarrelsome baron, who, in order to rob his weaker neighbors, would make any little mistake or misunderstanding the subject of a quarrel.

Mr. Rolph, however, had not as yet been sufficiently near him to give any chance for Baron Blacknose to rob the village.

Try as he would, Baron Blacknose could not find any real cause for a quarrel; so, getting impatient, he one day started with his soldiers and without any warning commenced to drive away the cattle and to take such of the grain and fruits from the village as he could find.

Mr. Rolph could not see this robbery without feeling very angry, and stepping up to Baron Blacknose he asked the cause of the work.

Perhaps some of you have noticed that when a liar or a coward can find no excuse for his wrongdoing he usually abuses the people who tell him of it. Baron Blacknose, although a great soldier, was at heart a coward and did not have courage enough to earn an honest living.

Such cowards as these are the worst kind, and after Baron Blacknose had abused Mr. Rolph he ordered his soldiers to take him and his family as prisoners to the castle in the forest until the villagers should send a certain amount of money as a ransom. He did this to get the money which Mr. Rolph's friends might bring to buy back his freedom. You see, Blacknose could not take with him the houses and lands that his prisoner owned. He knew well that Mr. Rolph's friends could sell them and bring the money.

On the way back to his castle the baron was very impatient because poor little Dot could not keep up with the soldiers, and as Dot was too small to walk fast his father offered to carry him. Now Baron Blacknose knew that if he did not return without delay many of the people he had wronged would be glad to take advantage of his absence and capture his castle. On this account, when they camped for the night, he told one of his soldiers to take Dot to the village and sell him to a chimney sweep, or to any one who would take him out of their way.

"How much for this little jewel of a boy?"

The soldier took Dot and started, but before he reached the village he met an old chimney sweep. Now, this old man was always anxious to get a new boy, as he made boys work so hard that they ran away whenever they could and some of them died from hard work.

The soldier asked the old chimney sweep how much he would give for this little jewel of a boy. He called him a jewel because he was so small for his age.

After taking the money which the chimney sweep paid for Dot, the soldier turned back and by swift running overtook his master and the other soldiers.

The old chimney sweep was ugly and made Dot work very hard. He gave him no good bed upon which to sleep, and no food. The people whose chimneys Dot swept would give him what cold victuals they chose, and he would thank them for their kindness. The old chimney sweep was thus saved the expense of feeding little Dot, and Dot was really his slave.

Dot had always been very neatly dressed and had been taught to keep clean and tidy, so after he had carefully swept the first chimney he looked very sadly at his sooty clothes and asked to wash his hands and face. His master, however, wishing people to know that Dot was a chimney sweep, told him that he must not wash his face and hands, for if he went about clean like other boys no one would guess what his work was and unless there was soot upon his face and hands as well as upon his clothing some one might neglect to give him a job to clean their chimney.

Because in cleaning chimneys it is necessary to do it before the fires are built for breakfast poor little Dot had to get up very early in the morning.

One day, as they traveled from village to village, they saw a strange looking old house.

The chimney was a little smaller than that of most houses, and very few chimneys sweeps could climb so small a one.

Usually the old man made Dot climb on his shoulder, go up through the open fireplace and sweep a chimney as he climbed to the top.

Here seemed to be a chimney that no other boy would be able to climb, and the old man's eyes glistened as he thought of the extra money which he would charge should the chimney need sweeping.

An old lady came to the door. She said that the chimney very much needed to be cleaned, but that no boy had been found who was small enough to climb up through it and she did not think Dot would be able to sweep out the soot.

This pleased the old man, and he offered to clean out the chimney for twice the price usually charged.

The old lady was not at all particular as to the price which she paid.

The chimney was different from any that Dot had ever seen. Where he entered it from the fireplace it was of the usual size, but the top had been made so much smaller than usual that no chimney sweep had ever been able to climb through the upper half and come out on the roof, as they generally did in cleaning chimneys.

It was all very comfortable until he got half way up and then it was so small that he could get no farther. This seemed very strange, and while he was wondering how he could clean the upper half a chimney swallow perched on his shoulder and commenced to talk to him. First of all he told Dot to keep very quiet and to rattle the broomstick as he did it cleaning the chimney, for the minute the noise of rattling the broom against the side of the chimney ceased the old man put his head under the fireplace and shout up through the chimney: "Hi, there! Look alive, there!" And if he did not work lively there was sure to be trouble.

The swallow told Dot that this chimney was built purposely to catch chimney sweeps; that the old lady was very kind hearted and knowing how hard a time boys had would set any chimney sweep who seemed especially tired to work cleaning out her chimney.

"Now," said the swallow, "you just follow me and we will let the old man wait as long as he pleases."

Saying this, the swallow told Dot to press a little spring in one of the black, dirty bricks. The back of the chimney then swung to one side and showed a passage through which the swallow flew, with Dot following. The chimney back was again swung into place, and, the noise of the sweeping having stopped, the old man put his head into the fireplace and as usual shouted up the chimney. This time he received no answer, and getting impatient thrust his head farther into the chimney, just as the broom fell down. It knocked his hat off and made him very angry.

When the back of the chimney had swung into place, a black cloth bundle also had been pushed into the chimney opening, and as it shut out the light the old man felt sure in looking into the chimney again that poor little Dot had been unable to climb through the small opening and had stuck fast in the chimney.

As he had been quiet so long the old man thought he must be dead, and, thinking to save himself from trouble because he had sent a boy into a chimney where he had not been able to get out, the old man said to the lady of the house that Dot was a very lazy boy and no doubt had climbed up through the chimney and run away.

DIVERSION FOR DINERS.

Enigmatic menu cards, writes Laura Douglas in an article on "Easter Menu Cards," in April Ladies' Home Journal, are important factors to the enjoyment of guests at dinner. On such cards blue points may masquerade as "Cerulean dots" or "Colored angle." The shaddock, which is so often used for the first course, has been hidden under the phrase, "Fish and fowl" (shad-duck). Soup is described according to its kind, as "Make-believe terrapin" (mock-turtle), "Love-apple broth" (tomato), or a dozen other names which will occur after a few moments' thought. For fish the antique joke of "Poison" (poisson), or else it is described by its kind. Shad is known as "Bones," smelt as "Refines," salmon as "A scriptural character," cod as "A fashionable wrap," (Cape Cod), and trout as "Giraffes" (speckled beauties). "A character in Ivanhoe" can hide "F. de Bœuf," the initial representing both "Fillet" and the gigantic "Front." "Our National bird" will disguise not the eagle but the turkey. "So domestic" will describe ducks, and "Sail-back" the canvasbacked variety. Salad appears as "Nothing but leaves," or in case a mayonnaise of celery is used as "Below stairs-y" (cellar-y). Cheese is called "Slang," from "Cheese it," or is ignored with crackers, which are otherwise called "Favors," from the children's fancy crackers. Dessert is hailed as "An arid plain," with ice cream as "An oasis," "Frozen milk-top" or "A mockery king of snow." Pastry is described as "Printers' confusion" (pie—pi), and coffee as "A severe cold."

TAKING CARE OF THE BOY.

A boy should be kept busy, says Jenness Miller, every moment of his waking life, not working, of course, but busy. Tradition and experience teach no truer lesson than that of the broad scope of the devil's employment office. To keep ahead of its arts, to anticipate its wiles, requires eternal vigilance.

Give a boy some regular, responsible occupation; something to do that must be done; something that has continued interest; something to do the first thing in the morning—blacking shoes, tending fires, cleaning cellar, porch or walk, carrying milk or papers.

Give him hammer, nails and all kinds of tools. He will soon learn to handle without hurting. Encourage him in making things—playhouses, boxes, carts, derricks. Give him a garden to cultivate, pets to take care of. Again, give him something to do that must be done that he will do because interesting.

How often arises that question—what to do—such a big question that it is dodged by sending the boy out into the street, bidding him "not to keep running." So he stays out until his boy's appetite, his big boy's appetite, brings him in.

Then how is he met on that ground? Is there not a continuance of more or less nagging during the meal to insure good manners? There is really no greater point in the temperance work than in feeding the boys. They should have good strong nourishing food and plenty of it. Let the meals be something to be remembered, something to anticipate.

There was a precocious youngster on a suburban railroad train, recently, who furnished the passengers with considerable amusement. His mother, desiring to ask the conductor a question concerning changing cars, told her only son to hail him when he passed by. The blue uniformed man with a punch soon appeared. "Say, mister, my mother wants to see you," exclaimed the young scion, in a voice loud enough to be heard all over the car. The conductor, who was busy, replied: "I'll be back in a minute." This did not satisfy mamma's pet, for as the conductor reached the end of the car he exclaimed in a loud voice: "You had better hurry up, or you'll get it where the chicken got the ax!" The passengers laughed loudly, while the mother of the enfant terrible remembered that she was in the wrong car —Boston Traveler.

FRIDAY EVENING, AUGUST 28, 1896.

THORNDIKE THIS TIME.

The Thorndikes Win the Second of the Championship Ball Games.

Fadgen's pitching was an easy mark for Thorndike, and this, together with Bondsville's inability to hit Sugrue, and loose playing in the field, won for them the second game in the championship series at Bondsville Saturday afternoon. Sugrue pitched a good game with the exception of the seventh and eight innings, when he had to take a little of the medicine which Fadgen was compelled to swallow throughout the game. Sawin of the Holyoke Athletics covered third for Thorndike, and aside from two wild throws fielded his position well. Kelliher's work at first was a bit rocky, and his playing would have lost a close game. The batting of Sugrue, Roche and Chapman, and the fielding of Chapman were the features of the game. Shea played the best game for Bondsville.

Sawin opened the game for Thorndike and hit to Fadgen, who threw him out at first; Kennedy and Kelliher hit to Connor, who retired them on two pretty assists to first. For Bondsville, Connor walked and stole second; Burton went out, Sugrue to Kelliher; Ryan flew out to center and Connor went to third on the play; Shea hit to Sawin and would have been out at first if Kelliher had not dropped the ball, this error also allowing Connor to score from third; Nelson got his base on balls and Fadgen forced Shea at third on a ground ball to Sawin. It looked as if the game would be interesting, but it was robbed of all such interest the next inning, when the Thorndikes fell upon Fadgen and pounded his curves right and left. Sugrue singled and Roche followed suit; Sullivan hit to Connor, who threw wild to first; Riley sent a fly to Moriarty, who muffed it, and two runs crossed the plate; Hurley went out, Nelson to Conway; Chapman hit safe, scoring Sullivan and Riley, and he scored a minute later on a wild pitch; Sawin flew out to Nelson; Kennedy hit a swift grounder to Ryan, who put it to first but Conway dropped the ball; Kelliher hit for two bases, Sugrue did the same, scoring Kennedy and Kelliher; Roche hit safely, scoring Sugrue, and Sullivan ended the inning by going out, Nelson to Conway. For Bondsville, Moriarty struck out; Conway went out, Sawin to Kelliher; Sullivan struck out. In the third inning Thorndike scored one on Conway's error and Chapman's two-bagger. Bondsville was retired without a run. With two men on bases and two out Nelson drove a line ball to second which Riley squeezed, saving two runs. In the fourth a two-bagger by Kelliher, a single by Roche and an error by Conway gave Thorndike another run, but a pretty double play by Fadgen, Bruton and Conway retired the side. For Bondsville, Fadgen went out, Kennedy to Kelliher; Moriarty hit a ground ball to Sugrue who threw high to first; Moriarty kept on running, and Kelliher tried to throw him out at third, but he also threw high and Moriarty scored. In the fifth, Chapman flew out to Moriarty; Sawin hit to third but Connor threw high and he was safe; Kennedy struck out; Kelliher hit Ryan, who fell all over the ball, and Sawin scored; Sugrue hit safe; Roche hit to third, but Connor again threw high and Kelliher and Sugrue scored; Sullivan hit to short but the ball was thrown wild, and if Riley had not struck out, there is no telling when Thorndike would have been retired. Bondsville went out in order. In the sixth both sides scored once. In the seventh Thorndike was retired without a score. Bondsville opened fire on Sugrue in lively style. Connor, Ryan and Shea made two-baggers; Sawin made an error and Sullivan had a passed ball, and as a result four runs were made. In the eighth with three men on bases, Kennedy put the ball over the hotel, scoring three runs, but he was caught at the plate; Sugrue was hit by the ball and scored later on Sullivan's hit. In their half, Bondsville scored five runs on hits by Bruton, Ryan and Nelson, and errors by Kennedy and Kelliher. In the ninth, hits by Chapman, Kelliher and Sugrue, a base on balls to Sawin and two stolen bases gave Thorndike four more. For Bondsville, Fadgen went out, Sugrue to Kelliher; Moriarty and Conway ended the game by striking out.

Both teams have now won a game, and the next one will of course be for blood. The score:

Work of Macadamizing Thorndike Street Commenced.

The work of permanent highway building, which has been at a standstill on Thorndike street for about a week, was begun again yesterday morning. The suspension of the work was because the selectmen received notice that a steam roller, for which they had made application to the state highway commission, had been ordered sent them. This is one of the machines which the last Legislature authorized purchased and placed under the control of the county commissioners, to be loaned out by them to town authorities, and is No. 2. It arrived Wednesday. There was no one to give the slightest instruction regarding its operation, but after it was unloaded from the cars G. B. Kenerson and John Brainerd tackled it and soon had it set up and in shape to run. After a few trials on Park street to get the hang of the thing it was brought down through Main to the foot of Thorndike street and there left over night. There is not much need of leaving a watchman in charge, as the net weight is 12 tons. The machine is a Buffalo Pitts roller, and will be in charge of John Brainerd. A stone crusher has also been shipped the selectmen, but as there is no power accompanying it will not be used this season. Next spring, however, the selectmen expect to put it in use. One hundred tons of trap-rock were sent from the Flynt quarry Wednesday night, and yesterday teams began drawing it to Thorndike street, where the rollor is rapidly packing it in place. The acquisition of a state roller will make it possible for the selectmen to build more macadam road than was first expected, owing to the saving in expense in this line. Mr. Brainerd, who has charge of the work, is also charging one-half the cost of the preparatory grading of Thorndike street to the general road expenses, as the material taken from there is put in other places where it is badly needed, in some instances at less than half what it would cost were the material procured elsewhere. It is expected that the sum allotted for permanent roads, with these additions, will carry the macadam nearly to house of John Pasco.

DEATH OF FRANKLIN BLANCHARD.

One of the Earliest Manufacturers in the Town of Palmer.

Another of our oldest citizens has been called home, after a long and busy life, nearly all of which has been spent in this town. By the death of Mr. Franklin Blanchard, at the old homestead in Blanchardville on Tuesday morning, the last of the firm that stands out so prominently in the early manufacturing history of Palmer was taken away.

Mr. Blanchard was born in the town of Millbury, Mass., May 20, 1818, the youngest son of John B. and Silence (Barton) Blanchard. His father was one of a family of four sons and one daughter,—Stephen, Simon, Thomas, who achieved a more than national reputation as an inventor,—John B., and Susan. John B. was born in Millbury, and having learned the art of scythe making, first established a manufactory in his native town, but soon removed it to Dudley, continuing there until 1824. Just before this time one of his brothers, in his frequent trips between Worcester and Springfield, was attracted by the fine water privilege on the Quaboag river in the eastern edge of the town of Palmer, and by his advice John B. sold out his business in Dudley and removed here, to lay the foundation for what soon became, for those days, an immense business, in the manufacture of scythes, which were noted for their excellence throughout the country, and the output reached 2500 dozens annually, and this too, long before Palmer had the advantage of transportation by steam for its products to the markets of the world. When the elder Blanchard retired from business, it was turned over to his four sons, Alonzo, William, John and Franklin, and by them carried on for nearly, or quite, a quarter of a century, when the youngest son disposed of his interest, and soon after the advent of improved labor-saving machinery in the field lessened the demand for even the best of hand tools, and the business was discontinued.

His uncle Thomas having invented a wonderful process for steaming and bending wood, Franklin engaged in the business of making wheel rims, sleigh runners, ox bows, plow handles and articles of a similar nature, carrying on an extensive business and gaining a high reputation for the superior excellence of his work. In business Mr. Blanchard was a most untiring, energetic worker, acquiring an intimate and thoroughly practical knowledge of even the minutest details of the manufacture of the goods which make the Blanchard name famous, and labored early and late for success.

After his mother's death he bought the old homestead, built by his father, and in this his last years have been spent in the peace and quiet of a well-earned rest. He was twice married, his first wife being Sarah S. Blanchard, who lived but a few years, and his daughter Laura died young. His second wife, who survives him, was Frances Holland Temple of Boston. By this marriage there were three children, Laura Pierce, the wife of Editor Lawrence of the North Brookfield Journal, Henry Fuller, who died in 1873, and Frank Seger, a successful printer and publisher of Worcester. There are four grandchildren.

Mr. Blanchard never sought public office, but ever took a lively interest in public affairs, up to the very last. In politics he was a Democrat of the Jeffersonian type, ever positive in his convictions. Upright and honorable in every transaction of business or private life, he gained and held the respect and esteem of the entire community, and in the home his children rise up to call him blessed. He was the last survivor of the original members of the Second Congregational parish, a member of the church, and for a time superintendent of its Sunday school and an active worker in it.

His funeral was attended from the home in Blanchardville yesterday afternoon, Rev. F. E. Jenkins conducting the service. The casket, in the spacious hall, was covered and surrounded by beautiful floral offerings from the family and friends, and as the body was laid in its final resting place, beneath a cloudless sky, the children and grandchildren dropped in their bouquets as a last offering to his memory.

THREE RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.

A Brakeman is Crushed, Another's Toes Pinched, and a Tramp Killed.

John F. Sloane, assistant billing clerk and telegraph operator at the New London Northern freight house, was crushed between two moving freight cars Tuesday morning. A part of his work was the sealing of cars and the taking of their numbers. At the time of the accident he was riding on the end ladder of a car which he was about to seal. The draw bar on this car had been pulled out, but Sloane did not notice it. Another car had been sent down the track by the switcher and was coming at a good speed down the grade; when the cars met, the draw bar being gone, they came together, binding Sloane between them. The accident was seen by several men employed about the yard, who hauled the cars apart, took Sloane from between them and carried him to the freight house. Dr. L. H. Hendee was called. No bones were found broken, but he was badly crushed about the chest; one lung was injured so as to cause internal bleeding, and a severe scelp wound was sustained. He was removed to the home of his brother-in-law, C. A. Atwood, on School street. Mr. Sloane's home is in West Castleton, Vt. He had been employed in his present position about two weeks. At last accounts the injured man was doing well, and it is expected that he will ultimately recover.

G. Dubois, a brakeman on the Boston and Albany railroad, while attempting to get on his train when in motion at the freight yard Tuesday evening, slipped and fell, and one car passed over his left foot. His foot was badly split and his toes crushed. He was taken to the depot, where he was attended by Dr. William Holbrook. It is thought that his foot will not have to be amputated. Later in the evening he was removed to his home in West Warren.

The third accident within three days took place about 10 o'clock Wednesday evening, when a tramp was run over by a freight train in the Boston and Albany yard. He was seen waiting about the depot all the afternoon; in the evening about ten o'clock he got on this freight and was put off by the conductor. Just as the train started he attempted to get on again, but slipped under the wheels. Both his legs were cut off just below the knee. He was taken to the depot and attended by Dr. William Holbrook, but died about two hours after the accident. He gave his name as A. J. Ballard of Boston, 30 years of age, and said he had no home nor friends. His body was removed to Loomis' undertaking rooms. The body was buried yesterday afternoon in the Catholic cemetery at Thorndike.

PALMER NEWS.

DRUGGISTS AND NO LICENSE.

What They May and May Not Do During No License Times.

There has been a great variety of opinions regarding the rights and privileges of the druggists in the matter of sales of liquor since the first of May, when they were deprived of their licenses, and a little information on the subject may save trouble and annoyance. An application was made last Sunday to one of the local druggists for alcohol with which to bathe an invalid; it was refused unless a physician's prescription was brought. The physician attending the sick man was not available, and it was only after some trouble that another was found. This seems an unnecessary state of affairs, but the druggist was undoubtedly right. The statutes provide that "Druggists and apothecaries may sell pure alcohol for medicinal, mechanical and chemical purposes;"

But another section says that.

"No sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors shall be made between the hours of 12 at night and 6 in the morning, nor during the Lord's day,"

Though druggists are released from this restriction when the sale is made on a physician's prescription. As alcohol is classed as a spirituous and intoxicating liquor, a physician's prescription is therefore necessary for its purchase on the Sabbath.

The fact that physicians' prescriptions calling for a slight quantity of whisky, brandy or other liquor, cannot be filled in the town has occasioned no little criticism. This is a condition of affairs for which the druggists themselves are alone and wholly responsible, a decision of the supreme court being that

"The keeping without a license of intoxicating liquors, only for the purpose of mixing them with other ingredients, according to the prescription of physicians, to be used as medicine, and of manufacturing such compounds as are commonly used by druggists for medicinal purposes, is not a violation of the Statute of 1875, Chap. 90."

The inability to fill such prescriptions, then, is a matter of choice with the druggists. Both firms in this village give as their reason for not keeping enough liquor for such purposes, that calls for the sale of liquors are so frequent that they prefer to say they haven't a drop in the place.

One idea which many seem to be possessed of is that, although the druggists have no license, they can sell liquor on a physician's prescription. This is wholly erroneous; unless holding a druggist's license, they are barred from selling everything of this nature except alcohol.

Celebrated Postal Dog "Owney" Pays Palmer a Visit.

"Owney," the pet dog of the railroad mail clerks, was in town Wednesday morning. He came in on a train from the east, and later went north with the mail clerk on the Central Vermont. "Owney" is a very remarkable dog. He is known to every mail clerk and has traveled all over the United States. He first joined the Post Office Department at Albany, N. Y. In some way he wandered into the post office in that city, and as no one claimed him he was satisfied to make his home there. He soon became accustomed to ride in the mail wagon to the station, and then to ride with the mail pouches in the cars. He rides upon the pouches, leaving the car at any station he wishes and going in whatever direction he pleases. He wears a fine silver collar marked "Owney," Albany P. O., Albany, N. Y. John Wanamaker, when he was Postmaster General, presented him with a fine harness, and in this he has traveled all over the country. At the post office in Albany are hundreds of medals which have been presented to him on his journeys. The most wonderful thing "Owney" ever did was to travel around the world alone. He started on his great trip from Tacoma, Washington, August 19, 1895, and visited in Japan and China. He had with him passports like any traveller. He met many of the government officials, and brought home with him many medals and tags to add to his collection. He arrived in New York in December, went to the post office, and then went to Tacoma, having completed the circuit of the globe in 132 days. He has not visited Palmer for several years, and so his appearance attracted much attention. "Owney" is of mongrel breed and is not handsome, but possesses many excellent qualities and is very intelligent. He is without doubt the best known and most universally popular dog in the world.

Dwelling House Burned This Morning.

The house on the Gamwell farm near the Palmer Water Company's reservoir, occupied by Patrick Carey, was totally destroyed by fire this morning. When Mr. Carey awoke about 4 o'clock he discovered that the woodshed in the rear of the house was in flames, and that the back of the house itself was ablaze. He quickly aroused the family, and an effort was made to save some of the things in the house. An alarm was rung in from the carpet mill box and the fire apparatus responded, but was sent back before it reached the fire. The fire started in the woodshed, the door of which was left unlocked. No reason can be assigned for the cause of the fire other than it was of incendiary origin. Very little of the furniture was saved, and the loss is hardly covered, being insured for $200 in the Hanover of New York. Mr. Carey also lost a pocketbook containing several hundred dollars which he had recently drawn from the bank. Two barns on this farm were burned July 11. The house was insured for $1100 in the Merchants of Newark.

Wineburgh of New York. The price paid is $50,000, and the concern will be made a corporation with a capital stock of $100,000. Application for a charter has been made, and the officers will be: President, R. M. Burnett; vice president, M. Wineburgh; secretary, G. M. Atkins; treasurer, S. H. Hellyar. Messrs. Burnett and Wineburgh will attend to the advertising of the food, in which it is proposed to spend $100,000 druing the next year, while Messrs. Atkins and Hellyar will do the manufacturing and shipping. The new men are both wealthy, experienced and successful in business matters, and feel confident that the present business can be trebled in twelve months' time.

Marcy & Gardner's Amherst Brickyard Damaged by Fire.

The brickyard of Marcy and Gardner at South Amherst was damaged by fire last Friday evening. The fire first caught early in the evening and was quickly extinguished, but about midnight broke out again. On account of the scarcity of water the flames spread rapidly, and the large piles of wood were soon ablaze. By hard work 300 cords of wood were saved, and also the dwelling houses near the yard. A number of sheds and 200 cords of wood were burned. The total loss is about $1500. The whole is well insured.

MONSON.

VETERANS MEET ONCE MORE.

Annual Reunion of the 31st Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The gallant 31st regiment of Massachusetts volunteers held its 23d reunion in Memorial Hall yesterday with about 50 members present. The houses and places of business along the street near where the veterans would pass on going from the station and the hall had been tastefully decorated with flags and bunting in anticipation of the event. Carriages conveyed the ladies and some of the veterans from the station, Marcus Keep post and the Monson Cornet Band doing escort duty. The hall was also decorated with flags and flowers. Selectman Arthur D. Norcross met the company at the hall, and did the honors very gracefully. At 10.30 a. m. a business meeting of the association was held, with President E. I. Clapp, city clerk of Northampton, chairman. After Secretary O S. Hopkins had read the records of the reunion of '95, held at Huntington, he read the names of those of the regiment who had died during the year They are: Col. O. P. Gooding, in an asylum in Washington, D. C., Comrads Dexter Vaughn, Ransom Kendall, L. L. Bilings and G. A. Goodwin. A Belchertown comrade then in behalf of the selectmen of Belchertown and the post of that town, invited the regiment to hold its next reunion there, and the invitation was unanimously accepted, the date being the last Tuesday in August. The secretary then read letters of regret from Col. N. A. M. Dudley of Roxbury, Nelson F. Bond of Fitchburg, a former student in Monson Academy, J. D. Tupper of Washington, D. C., C. F. Wright of Brooklyn, D. L. Converse of Gilmantown, N. H., Col. J. W. Kimball, auditor of Massachusetts. Major Rice then read a resolution which was adopted, to ask Congress to award G. B. Canterbury a medal for capturing several prisoners during the war. Comrade Alden, the historian, reported that the regiment history would probably be in the publisher's hands at the next reunion, and desired all who had any information of interest concerning the regiment to send it to him. These officers and committees were then chosen; President, E. C. Clapp, vice president, Ser. H. M. Coney; secretary, David G. Remmington; treasurer, W. L Bishop; auditor, Adelbert Bailey; committee to arrange for the reunion of '97, Thomas Jenks of Belchertown, G. B. Canterbury of Ware, W. M. Ayers of Springfield; honorary committee, Commander F. L. Plaintiff and Adjutant W. A. Snow of the Belchertown post. A vote of thanks was extended to the post, Woman's Relief Corps, Monson Band, and the citizens for their kindness. At the close of this session dinner was served in the hall by Marcus Keep corps, after which there was speech making, and songs by Comrade M. F. Miller of the 46th of Springfield. The following is a nearly complete list of those present:

GOLDEN WEDDING ANNIVERSARY.

Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Tucker Celebrate 50 Years of Married Life.

Mr. and Mrs. George E. Tucker have rounded out 50 years of married life, and celebrated the anniversary yesterday. Their pleasant house on the Quarry road was handsomely trimmed with golden-rod and marigolds, and the figures "1846" and "1896," made of golden-rod, were conspicuously placed on the parlor wall, the couple standing near on a mat of golden-rod when receiving their numerous friends who called during the afternoon and evening to congratulate them. Valuable presents were given the couple, including articles of silver and a sum of money in gold.

George E. Tucker, son of Captain Joel and Lomene (Keep) Tucker, was born on the East Hill farm, which had then been in the Tucker family for some time. The house in which he was born still stands, but the house near by, built by Captain Joel, is the one occupied by the family of the late Joel, another son. George E. was educated in the Monson schools, and has always followed farming. With the exception of two years spent in Medway and East Chatham, he has always been a resident of Monson. He is a strong Republican, a man of means, and much respected. Mrs. Tucker is Lucinda L., daughter of the late Seth and Sallie (Curtis) Bradley of East Chatham. For some time previous to her marriage she was a guest at the home of her aunt in Bradford. The marriage was set for August 26, and it was to take place at the home of the bride's uncle, Fred Bradley, in Roxbury, and the plan was to drive from Bradford to Roxbury on the morning of the wedding. When the day arrived it rained; it literally poured, and as the two towns were 40 miles apart, postponement of the wedding was necessary. The following day, however, was fair, and the plan was then carried out. Rev. Mr. Isham performing the ceremony in the presence of about 20 persons. Mr. and Mrs. Isham, now of Washington, Mrs. Daniel Averill of Branford, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Tucker of New Haven are living, and the last three were present yesterday. Mr. and Mrs. Tucker went to the old homestead to live, and there their only son, Wilson M., was born. They moved to their present home 33 years ago, and it was there that Wilson M. brought his bride, Miss Burt, 25 years ago next November. Mr. and Mrs. W. M. have four children, the oldest of whom, Helen Bradley, married Joseph Wilkins in July of this year.

Among those present at the reception yesterday from out of town, besides those mentioned before, were Mrs. Katherine Keep of New Haven, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Hodgkinson and son of Wallingford, Ct., Mr. and Mrs. Ezra Tucker of Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Alonzo Newell of Hampden, Mrs. Julia Keep and Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hitchcock of Warren.

The Chaffee Family Reunion.

The 10th reunion of the Chaffee family was held Wednesday on Flynt Park with about 75 present. The people gathered in the morning, and at noon sat down to dinner. After dinner the company assembled in the pavilion for the formal part of the programme. Monroe Chaffee was chosen chairman. It was voted to hold the next reunion at Evergreen Park the last Wednesday in August, '97. The following executive committee was chosen: S. Frank Chaffee, chairman, Norman Chaffee, Charles Smith, Benjamin Chadwick Davis, Gilbert Chaffee; S. Frank Chaffee was chosen clerk and treasurer. J. W. West of Boston then gave an interesting talk on genealogy, and said that the first Chaffee came from England to this country and settled in Boston in 1635. He is supposed to have returned to England, but previous to 1690 two brothers of that name landed in Boston, and from them the two families represented at the reunion descended. These families are known as the Norman and Chadwich Chaffees. At the close of his remarks Mrs. Norman Chaffee gave a brief family sketch, and Mrs. Milo Gold gave a reading. There were also recitations by children. Of the Norman Chaffee family there were present:

Chaffee, Springfield; Mrs. Sarah Stebbins and son, Mr. and Mrs. Milo Gold and two children, West Stafford; Mrs. Almira Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, Hampden; Arthur Jones of Suffield. Chaffee and three children, Indian Orchard; Mrs. Howard, Springfield; Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Chadwick, Mrs. Ann son, Belchertown; Mrs. Emmeline Joslyn and two sons, Willington; Mrs. Etta Butler, Wilbraham; S. After meals you should have simply a feeling of comfort and satisfaction. You should not feel any special indications that digestion is going on. If you do, you have indigestion which means not-digestion. This may be the beginning of so many dangerous diseases, that it is best to take it in hand at once and treat it with Shaker Digestive Cordial. For you no know that indigestion makes poison, which causes pain and sickness. And that Shaker Digestive Cordial helps digestion and cures indigestion. Shaker Digestive Cordial does this by providing the digestive materials in which the sick stomach is wanting. It also tones up and strengthens the digestive organs and makes them perfectly healthy. This is the rationale of its method of cure, as the doctors would say. Sold by druggists, price 10 cents to $1.00 per bottle.

BAKER'S ICE WATER.

Cereals Mixed Therein.

Not all the harm said to come from iced tea is caused by the cold. Many persons who suffer from stomach and nervous disorders, find great relief by abandoning tea and coffee entirely. It is a common practise of the bakers who work all day over hot stoves at the Postum Cereal factory at Battle Creek, Mich, to stir cereals into the jars of ice water. Experience proves that very cold water can be used quite freely in this way without the ill efforts likely to follow the free use of plain ice water. This should teach a lesson. If one must have iced drinks at meals during the hot weather, take all the advantage possible and use Postum Cereal, the grain coffee, iced with sugar and a few drops of lemon juice. This gives a delicious cooling drink which is food in a liquid state and very nourishing and strengthening. Postum will agree with weak stomachs that suffer from tea or coffee, and is a great nerve builder, taken either hot or iced; try it.

There is but one genuine orginal Postum Cereal coffee, with a multitude of imitations offered as "just as good."

CARD OF THANKS.—I wish to express my thanks and appreciation to all my neighbors and friends who, by their love and sympathy, remembered me so kindly in various ways during my recent illness.

Condensed Testimony.

Chas. B. Hood, Broker and Manufacturer's Agent, Columbus, Ohio, certifies that Dr. King's New Discovery has no equal as a Cough remedy. J. D. Brown, Prop. St. James Hotel, Ft. Wayne, Ind., testifies that he was cured of a cough of two years standing, caused by La Grippe, by Dr. King's New Discovery. B. F. Merrill, Baldwinsville, Mass., says that he has used and recommended it and never knew it to fail, and would rather have it than any doctor, because it always cures. Mrs. Hemming, 222 E. 25th St., Chicago, always keeps it at hand and has no fear of croup, because it instantly relieves. Free Trials Bottles at LeGro & Lynde's Drug Store, Palmer; G. L. Childs Business College of Springfield begins its fall term September 1st. It is pleasing to watch the progress and improvement continually going on in this institution.

The banking and business departments have been bettered by the addition of a strong English course, and the student therein is allowed to study shorthand and typewriting in connection with bookkeeping without additional cost.

"Typewriting by touch," which has been taught at the school for several years, was exemplified in the most striking manner at the graduating exercises of the school last June.

To still further add to the interest in this important adjunct to the transaction of business, the college will offer a prize of $50.00 in gold to the typewriting in connection with the Commencement Exersises next June, and any student entering before October 5th is eligible.

My little boy, when two years of age, was taken very ill with bloody flux. I was advised to use Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and luckily procured part of a bottle. I care fully read the directions and gave it accordingly. He was very low, but slowly and surely he began to improve, gradually recovered, and is now as stout and strong as ever. I feel sure it saved his life. I never can praise the Remedy half its worth. I am sorry every one in the world does not know how good it is, as I do.—Mrs. Linda S Hinton, Grahamsville, Marion Co., Florida. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Poison ivy, insect bites, bruises, scalds, burns, are quickly cured by De Witt's Witch Hazel Salve, the great pile cure. LeGro & Lynde.

Since 1878 there have been nine epidemics of dysentery in different parts of the country in which Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy was used with perfect success. Dysentery, when epidemic, is almost as severe and dangerous as Asiatic cholera. Heretofore the best efforts of the most skilled physicians have failed to check its ravages; this remedy, however, has cured the most malignant cases, both of children and adults, and under the most trying conditions, which proves it to be the best medicine in the world for bowel complaints. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Six weeks ago I suffered with a very severe cold; was almost unable to speak. My friends all advised me to consult a physician. Noticing Chamberlain's Cough Remedy advertised in the St. Paul Volks Zeitung I procured a bottle, and after taking it a short while was entirely well. I now most heartily recommend this remedy to anyone suffering with a cold. Wm. KEIL, 678 Selby Ave., St. Paul, Minn. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Pearline reduces the labor, whether you use soft water or hard. But use Pearline, and it's just as easy to wash with hard water as with soft water—and the results are just as good.

Pearline saves more things than your labor, though. We'll tell you of these savings from time to time. Keep your eye on Pearline ' ads."

THE SABER'S STORY.

"Did you hear that?" suddenly exclaimed an old cavalry saber hanging on the wall above my desk for many a year.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Listen!"

After a moment the sound reached my ears—someone in the street sounding the call of "Boots and Saddles" on a bugle. It wasn't well done, but it had something of the old familiar ring—something to make the blood leap faster.

"I couldn't help but rattle about," said the saber, as the notes died away. "It's a quarter of a century since I've heard those notes, and yet it all comes back to me in a flash. I hear the commands 'Prepare to mount!' 'Mount!' and once more I am jangling alongside of a trooper's leg."

"Do you remember when I got you?" I asked.

"Of course I do. I was hanging in the kitchen of a farmer's house at Brandy Station, Va., and you bought me for two silver dollars. That was so soon after the war that I hadn't time to rust. You can't find many 'C. S. A.' belt-plates around these days I reckon."

"They are very scarce. What's your story?"

"That of a thousand other sabers. You've heard of Stuart, the chevalier, as our boys used to call him? Well, I had the honor to make that famous ride around McClellan's army with him. That was my first active service. I belonged to a captain, as you can see, and he knew how to handle me well. You remember when Stuart was killed? Well, on that day my captain was beset by three troopers at once, but we won a victory. The very first downstroke he made cut one of those common sabers slick in halves, and at his first 'point' I was driven through a trooper's body. Ugh! Makes me shiver to think of it! Poor Stuart! I saw strong men weep like children that day when they heard of his fatal wounding. Ever up the Shenandoah Valley?"

"Yes."

"Well, after a time my captain was transferred over there, and I was carried up and down until I knew every crook and turn of the highways. My captain was killed over there in a skirmish, and a second lieutenant of cavalry somehow got hold of me. This was promotion backwards, but I soon found out that he had strength and skill. It wasn't over three months, though, before he was also killed, and from then on I had a dozen owners. I was in the cavalry, infantry, and artillery by turns, and I always got round in time for all the big fights. You've heard of Fitzhugh Lee?"

"Yes."

"And Wade Hampton?"

"Of course."

"Well, at different times I served under both. The night Gen. Jackson was killed at Chancellorsville I wasn't a quarter of a mile away. Wasn't that a terrible blow to us! They kept the news from us as long as they could, but when it became known some looked white and scared and others hid their faces and wept. You were at Gettyburg, of course? Rather hot work there, eh? When Custer drove at us, thinking to get hold of our wagon-train, I had the honor of giving one of 'you uns' a slash across the face which made him a homely man the rest of his life. You men under Custer followed us over the mountains. Lands! but didn't it rain as Lee began to fall back? We turned on you two or three times, and left the road full of dead, but our orders were to fall back to the river. Did you make the Wilderness campaign?"

"Yes."

"What a place that was for mighty armies to grapple! I had gotten into the infantry, and this time a major had me. He was among the first killed, and before noon the captain of a battery had me buckled around him. I changed owners three times before Lee finally stood at bay and prepared to dole out the blood of the confederacy until the last drop was gone. Ah! those were grim and gruesome days. In and around Petersburg were barefooted captains and ragged colonels, and there were days when even a brigadier could not get full rations. Outside of the army were those who could see the beginning of the end, but we in it never gave up hoping. It was hope and fight, fight and hope, and even when the calamity came we couldn't comprehend it. We always believed 'Uncle Robert' would find a way out of it, but the day finally came when he had done all that human hands could do. Appomattox! Ah! it hurts, and yet why should it? We had done better than the veterans of Napoleon, and when we laid down our arms not a cheer was heard from your legions. You felt how it was, and you had only kind words. It was always 'Yank' and 'Johnny' with us at the front, and if the politicians had kept away we'd never felt the bitterness that came later on. I wouldn't have said a word, you know, but that bugle woke me up, and for just a minute I seemed to hear the old 'Yi!' yi! yi!" again, and to feel the exultation of a cavalry charge."—Detroit Free Press.

TO AVOID THE ODOR OF CABBAGE—A correspondent whose letter is signed "Sensitive," and whose note paper is ornamented with a cheerfully brilliant picture of birds flying through a wreath of flowers, writes to ask: "Is there any way of boiling cabbage that will not fill the house with an unpleasant odor?" Inquiry in circles where boiled cabbage is regarded as an article of food, reveals that there is a method of preparing it for the table whereby "Sensitive" may escape annoyance. Certain progressive housekeepers have discovered, it seems, that a rubber shoe, if cooked in the same kettle with the vegetable in question, will so complicate the resulting fragrance that it becomes rather an object of interest and curiosity than an excuse for faultfinding.—New York Times.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

A SURE CURE.—It is told of Hannah More that she had a good way of managing talebearers. It is said that whenever she was told anything derogatory to another her invariable reply was, "Come, we will go and ask if this be true." The effect was sometimes ludicrously painful. The tale-bearer was taken aback, stammered out a qualification, or begged that no notice be taken of the statement. But the good lady was inexorable; off she took the scandal-monger to the scandalized to make inquiry and compare accounts. It is not likely that anybody ever a second time ventured to repeat a gossipy story to Hannah More. One would think her method of treatment would be a sure cure for scandal.—Harper's Bazar.

NATURE'S BAROMETER.

If you can't afford a barometer to tell you what kind of weather you are going to have, perhaps the following old proverbs will prove of use in helping you to prophesy as to whether it will rain to-morrow or not:

If spiders in spinning their webs make the termination filaments long, we may in proportion to the length, conclude that the weather will be serene, and continue so for ten or twelve days.

If many gnats are seen in the spring, expect a fine autumn; if gnats fly in compact bodies in the beams of the setting sun, there will be fine weather.

If the garden spiders break and destroy their webs and creep away, expect rain or showery weather.

If sheep, rams and goats spring around in the meadows and fight more than usual, expect rain.

If cattle leave off feeding and chase each other around the pasture, rain.

If cats back their bodies and wash their faces, rain.

If foxes and dogs howl and bark more than usual, if dogs grow sleepy and dull, rain.

If moles cast up hills, rain.

If horses stretch out their necks and sniff the air and assemble in the corner of a field with their heads to leeward, rain.

If rats and mice be restless, rain.

If peacocks and guinea fowls scream and turkeys gobble, and if quails make more noise than usual, rain.

If the sea birds fly toward land and land birds fly toward the sea.

If the sea cock crows more than usual and earlier, expect rain.

If swallows fly lower than usual expect rain.

If bats flutter and beetles fly about, there will be fine weather.

If birds in general pick their feathers, wash themselves and fly to their nests, rain.

Some of the queerest miscellaneous quips received are to the effect that:

If there are no falling stars to be seen on a bright summer evening you may look for fine weather

If there be many falling stars on a clear evening in summer there will be thunder.

A rainbow in the morning is the shepherd's warning.

If fish bite more readily and gambol near the surface of the ponds and streams, then look out for rain.—Harper's Round Table.

OBEYED HIS ORDERS.

An Irish member of the 6th regiment of South Carolina infantry was stationed on the beach of Sullivan's Island, with orders to walk between two specified points, and to let no one pass without giving the countersign. He was one of those soldiers who believed in obeying orders to the letter. Two hours after Hugh had thus been stationed, the corporal with the relief appeared in the moonlight, and was astonished to see Hugh walking to and fro up to his waist in water. The tide had come in.

"Who goes there?" demanded the sentinal.

"Relief," answered the corporal.

"Halt, relief! Advance, corporal, and give the countersign."

"But I am not coming in there to be drowned. Come out and let me relieve you."

"Never a bit," said Hugh. The lieutenant told me not to leave me post."

"Well, then," said the corporal, starting to move a way, "you may stay there all night."

"Halt! thundered the sentry. "I'll put a hole in ye if you pass without the countersign," and he cocked and leveled the gun.

"Confound you and the lieutenant," answered the corporal. "Everybody will hear it if I bawl it out to you."

"Yes, me darling, and the liftenant said it must be given in a whisper. In with ye; me finger's on the trigger."

There was nothing for the corporal to do but to wade out where the faithful sentinel stood.

"Be Jabbers," said that worthy, "It's well you've come! the dirthy tide has almost drowned me."—Memphis Commercial Appeal

THE RETIRED BURGLAR.

"I don't suppose a man in my business is apt to get frightened very much," said the retired burglar. "He is all the time expecting things to happen, and he's always on the lookout for them. Still, I suppose that any man, unless he has an absolutely cast iron nerve, and such men are very few, is likely at times to be startled. I know that I am. For instance:

"I went into a house one night, and after groping around down stairs for a while in the blackest kind of darkness I went up stairs. There I found an open door. I had located from the outside of the house the windows of the room that this door opened into, and when I struck the door I knew where the bed ought to be. It was there, and I went along the side of it until I came to the head. I found a chair there with a man's clothes piled up on it. I picked up the trousers, and as I began to feel in the pocket—br-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r!, went an alarm clock on the bureau, not a foot from my head, and out of bed jumped a man, bumping square against me, of course not knowing that I was there, but knocking me endways and tumbling over on the floor himself.

"I certainly was startled by that alarm clock, make no mistake about that, and I have no doubt in my own mind that the man that jumped out of bed was startled when he fell over me, but I didn't stop to ask him about that."—New York Sun.

The Boston Traveler tells a good story about Colonel Patrick F. Shevlin, a prominent Boston Democrat and a man with a fine war record. When he went to the front he knew very little about war. His first big fight was at Gettysburg. He was a little worried about the tactics, and so, before the engagement began, asked his superior officer whether the fight was going to be helter-skelter or man for man. "Man for man," quickly quoth the officer. Six hours afterward, when the fight was hottest, the officer happened to go to the rear, and was surprised to see Colonel Shevlin seated on the prostrate body of a soldier who wore the gray. The colonel looked happy, smoking a short clay pipe. "You rascal!" the officer shouted: "why don't you go into the engagement and fight? Are you a coward?" "No, sirree," responded the Colonel; "I am obeying orders." "Obeying orders! How?" "Why, you told me man for man," sagely replied the Colonel, "and I've got my man here." Colonel Shevlin knew more about tactics after that, but his first promotion did not date from Gettysburg.

HOT BATH WILL BRING SLEEP.—Suppose a person be tired out by overwork of any kind, to feel nervous, irritable and worn, to be absolutely certain that bed means only tossing for hours in an unhappy wakefulness. We all know this condition of the body and mind. Turn on the hot water in the bath room and soak in the hot bath until the drowsy feeling comes, which will be within three minutes; rub yourself briskly with a coarse Turkish towel until the body is perfectly dry and then go to bed. You will sleep the sleep of the just, and rise in the morning wondering how you could have felt so badly the night before. The bath has saved many a one from a severe headache the next day.—Dr. Cyrus Edson, in Ladies' Home Journal.

A Lewiston man, who was a policeman in Portland, Me., when Gen. Neal Dow was mayor of that city in 1854, tells of a man whom he brought before Mayor Dow for abusing his wife while drunk. The mayor ordered that the culprit be brought before him with his whisky bottle. He put the bottle on the table in the court room, and the prisoner fixed his eyes on it and admitted that he had drank out of it. When the man was sent up to the jail Mayor Dow took the bottle along himself and requested the turnkey to place the flask just outside the cell door where the prisoner could see it, and it stood there two months. He begged to have the bottle broken or removed. Once when the door was opened he made a dash with his foot to break it, but did not succeed. When that man was released he hated the sight of a whisky bottle, and never tasted a drop of liquor afterward.

THE RED-HOT DOLLAR.

of Havana smoke until the train reached Albany. So completely absorbed had he become in the solution of this knotty problem in which his accident of the morning had involved him, and so convinced was he that the information must be for a time kept a secret, that he actually began to dread what was clearly inevitable,—the explanation he must shortly make to his wife.

His inclination was to tell her all. His duty to others forbade this. After pondering over the matter, he decided to explain that he had a happy surprise in store for her, one that had an important bearing on their future, and which unfortunately necessitated a change in their plans for a honeymoon in Europe.

This, on reaching the Delavan House, he expressed to a very pretty and very anxious little woman who was awaiting him, together with a good many other things not necessary to this story. And, instead of the steamer for Europe, the reunited pair took a train for Philadelphia. Early the next day the young man presented himself at the office of Dr. James Wickliffe, at Germantown, who smilingly admitted having given the shining dollar to his mother two days before. He had received the coin from a patient, a letter-carrier named John Lennon, and remembered it because of the following strange story related to him by Lennon himself.

A few days before, the carrier was engaged in delivering mail from door to door along Vine street, Philadelphia, when a zig-zag trip across the street and back again brought him to the narrow stairway of a dingy brick house, in front of which hung an enormous brass key bearing the word "Locksmith." Here he paused to draw a little parcel from his bundle. As he did so he heard something fall with a metallic clink upon the stone pavement. He looked and saw that it was a silver dollar, which rolled toward the gutter and came to a stop close by the curb. Hastening to pick it up, he instantly dropped it with a cry of pain.

The coin was almost red-hot!

The letter-carrier stood nursing his hand and thinking for two or three minutes. Silver dollars do not commonly drop out of the sky. But that this one should fall like a meteorite in a condition too heated for handling was certainly more than surprising—it was astonishing! The man looked up at the dingy brick house and examined it attentively, noting that the ground floor was occupied as a green grocery and that all of the windows were shut save one in the third story.

Then he kicked the mysterious coin into a puddle, fished it out again with his fingers, and put it into his trousers' pocket. He was about to investigate further, when some small boys called his attention to the fact that it was the first day of April, whereupon he proceeded on his way. He gave no further thought to the matter until that night, when he found that his thumb and forefinger had been so badly burned as to require treatment. The next morning he called upon the doctor, who dressed the painful hand and received the mysterious coin in payment for his services.

That night, behind locked doors in one of the officers' rooms of the United States Mint in Chestnut street, two men were engaged in a long whispered conference.

The wife of one of the men, as she sat in her room in the Continental Hotel, anxiously waiting for her husband, was beginning to wonder whether, after all, marriage was a failure!

Two days later, in speaking of the seizure of over forty thousand bogus silver dollars and the clever capture of three of the most dangerous counterfeiters that ever attacked the currency of the United States, the Daily News said:

The most remarkable part of the whole story is that one of the coins, fresh from the machine of one of the counterfeiters, fell out of a third story window near which he was working, and picked up while almost red-hot by a letter carrier, and passed as genuine through various hands until it reached Buffalo, where, by the merest accident it came into the possession of Mr. Ansel Hobart of the secret service. That gentleman noticed an imperfection at one point of its rim, and succeeded in tracing the coin to the headquarters of the gang on Vine street, where, under a cloak of a locksmith shop and green grocery business, six hundred of the spurious coins were turned out daily. So admirably were these counterfeits executed as to defy scrutiny save by experts of the government. The coins were not cast in moulds after the ordinary fashion, but were struck with a die, and plated so thickly with silver as to withstand tests by acids. The defect which led to this discovery was found only in the one coin already spoken of, and it is supposed that it was this defect that caused the piece to spring from the finishing machine and fall out of the window.

And the New York papers of three days later contained the intelligence that the White Star steamer "Majestic," which sailed for Liverpool that day, had among her passengers Mr. and Mrs. Ansel J. Hobart of Chicago, Ill.—The Black Cat.

VIRTUES OF THE APPLE.—The apple is such a common fruit, says Dr. G. R. Sarles, that very few persons are familiar with its remarkably efficacious medicinal properties. Everybody ought to know that the very best thing that they can do is to eat apples just before retiring at night. Persons uninitiated in the mysteries of the fruit are liable to throw up their hands in horror at the visions of dyspepsia which such a suggestion may summon up, but no harm can come to even a delicate system by the eating of ripe and juicy apples just before going to bed. The apple is excellent brain food, because it has more phosphoric acid, in easily digested shape, than any other fruit. It excites the action of the liver, promotes sound and healthy sleep, and thoroughly disinfects the mouth. This is not all. The apple helps the kidney secretions, and prevents calculus growths, while it obviates indigestion, and is one of the best-known preventives of diseases of the throat. Everybody should be familiar with such knowledge.

"Why did you break off your engagement with Miss Bertha?" Because her parrot was always saying, 'Stop that, George.'" "But what difference did that make? Your engagement was not a secret?" "But my name is not George."—New York Herald.

FOOLISH FEAR OF THUNDER.

Electric storms are far less dangerous than the majority of people imagine. That a severe lightning storm is terrifying admits of no question, and will sometimes bring great uneasiness to the heart of the strongest man. But the real danger is slight. The chances of lightning striking a house, for example, is not one in a million. Particularly is this true in cities, strung as most of them are, with electric wires. The great danger from electric storms is in the country, and even there the danger may be lessened if the simplest and most common sense of precautions are exercised. The surest electric conductor is a draught, and if, when a thunderstorm approaches, it is seen that all windows and doors liable to occasion a draught are kept closed, the danger is at once reduced to a minimun. If a woman is "caught" out in a thunderstorm the safest shelter is a house; the most dangerous a tree, particularly an oak-tree. It is a particular, but nevertheless a proven fact, that the oak is the most susceptable of all trees to currents of electricity. Over fifty per cent of trees struck by lightning storms during one summer, the Government statistician tells us, were oaks, while the beech tree was the least harmed. Therefore, the worst possible place of shelter in an electrical storm is under an oak tree, while by all odds the safest place is in a house and out of a draught. The actual danger from an electric storm is, in truth, not from the lightning nor the thunder, but from the nervous condition into which women allow themselves to fall.

The Old Hedgerow.

Over the same old road, sweetheart, that we strolled in the long ago,
I am wandering once again, alone, where the sweet wild roses blow;
And I pause by the hedge to whisper, dear, to the blossoms so pink and fair,
A poor little faded sorrow, love, there's nobody else to share.

Summer, with all its joys, sweetheart, is out on the old highway,
But the breezes sigh as they pass me by, and unto the forest stray;
Wistfully sigh the breezes, love, as they pass me standing there
By the old hedgerow, where the roses blow, and nobody seems to care.

Over the dear old road, sweetheart, in the shadowy cool of day,
Comes the echos low of long ago, the tenderest things to say;
And I smile again as the twilight glows, and banish my long despair
With a thought of you that is sweet and true, and I wonder if you will care.

Something of other days, sweetheart, the breezes are singing low,
Something that thrills the roses, love, and lends them a brighter glow;
Something that soothes the restless pain I have patiently learned to wear
Through the endless days on the old highways, where nobody seems to care.

AN AUTUMN LOVE-STORY.

I.

The rector of Orlestone sat in his study, gazing into the fire. He was alone; he was always alone, for though he loved his sheep and tended them, they were not companionable. He had lived alone now these many years, how many he sighed to remember. Once upon a time—oh! but before the flood—he had been young and strong and hopeful, and had loved a woman passionately, so passionately that honor and his plighted word had become as nothing to him, and he had broken faith with the gentle she was engaged to marry. And then he had found out that his passion's queen had no least intention of marrying him. As he looked in the fire this October evening, he remembered so well how she had told him that that on which he had staked his whole life's treasure could never be.

"I must marry a rich man," she had said, "for my poor father's sake." With tears and many kisses she had said it, and he, with kisses and the tears the heart bleeds in solitude, had believed her.

It was many years now since he had left behind him the world that held her, and had accepted the rectory of Orlestone, with its miserable £150 a year. And still o' nights, when the curtains were drawn, and the wind outside was wild in the laurel and cypresses, when the bare thorny rose-sprays tapped at the window like bony fingers, he sat by his fire, and thought of the woman he had loved, and loved still. He had her portrait in the secret drawer of his shabby old writing-desk, the one that had been his father's. And sometimes he would take out the portrait—the bright girlish face—and look at it and sigh, yet with a half-gladness that the knife was still sharp in the old wound.

Celia Ringwood, the woman who loved him, whom he should have married, had told him that time would dull the pain, but time had not dulled it, and he was glad. He had given up ambition and friends, and dreams, the old life and old life's hopes, to shut himself up alone with the plain daily duty—and this love-memory. And if the memory had failed him, had grown dim, what would have been left to him? Celia Ringwood, in her little lonely house in the market town, thought there might be much.

He came to see her once a week, and talked about the parish. Once he had been used to talk of the other woman; he did not mean to be cruel; she had taken his confession of his unfaithfulness so calmly, and so gently begged to be his friend, that he at once believed she had never cared for him. But such talk was over now. He had not spoken of her now for years. Celia began to think, almost to hope. Then she looked in the glass at her faded face, her pale hair, from which all youth's colors had gone; and she sighed a sigh that was half a shudder, put on her demure bonnet and cloak, and went out through the rain to see a child who was ill, because that was the only ease for her heartache.

II.

Celia Ringwood was washing up the breakfast things—not, as all genteel people in stories seem to do, in the parlor, but in a workmanlike manner in the back kitchen. She had just hung up the teacloth to dry, when her heart stood still, and then began to beat violently. At thirty-eight one's heart can beat just as quickly as it can at eighteen, and much more painfully, if one hears a certain footstep on the threshold or a certain hand on the door-knocker.

"Good morning, James," she said sedately. "This is an unusual and pleasant surprise." Some of the light still lingered on her face, but the rector did not observe it; his own thin face was slightly flushed, and his gray eyes were shining.

"May I come in?" he said. "I want to talk to you."

She led him into the little parlor—spotlessly neat. Miss Celia instinctively turned the blind so that the sunshine should not fade the carpet, and said—"Well?"

"You've always been such a true friend to me," he said nervously. "I've always told you everything."

"Yes," she said; and her heart knew his errand even before he spoke.

"Celia, her husband is dead, and she has taken the hall at Orlestone."

Celia Ringwood held out her hand to him. The light went out suddenly in her face, but it left the kindly mouth and eyes as he had always seen them, and only one who had loved her would have noticed the change.

"Only last night,', he said, "it seemed to me there was nothing left in life but duty and blessed faith in the life to come. But now—oh, Celia!—I feel young again."

"Shall you ask her again to marry you?" There was a harsh note in her voice which she herself noted with dismay. But he did not perceive it.

"Yes, of course," he said simply.

Miss Ringwood bit her lip.

"You are very poor," she said, "and Lady Mountdew is very rich. People will say—she might think—"

"You don't know Eva Mountdew," he said proudly.

Celia was ashamed of her words before he had answered them.

She held his thin hand a moment between her soft palms, and looked at him wistfully.

"Whatever happens," she said, "I know you will not forget old friends." Her voice trembled a little as she said it.

"Dear Celia," he answered, and some faint, sub-conscious stirring of remorse made his voice very gentle and tender—"Dear Celia, I am very selfish; you have been too patient with me."

She laughed a little and took her hands away.

"An old maid must have something to spoil," she said. "If it had not been you, it would have been a cat or a canary bird. When shall you see her?"

"This afternoon. She has asked me to come up to tea. She has let the Ashford people furnish a few rooms, and she is camping out, as she calls it, till the rest of her furniture comes from London."

There was a pause, then he got up suddenly, and began to walk up and down the narrow space between the door and the window, with knitted brows and hands clasped behind him.

"Well?" said Miss Ringwood.

"It isn't that I doubt her constancy," he said, "but I don't know whether it's fair. I'm old, you see, and I have grown dull. It is rather like offering her the dry husks of—of—"

"Of what she threw away fifteen years ago."

"You are unjust," he said.

"No, no; I didn't mean it, James. Now you must go. I am very busy; and be sure you come and tell me about it. Good-by; you need not be afraid because your hair is gray. If she loved you—well, good-by."

He went off down the street with a new hopefulness in his step. When he was gone, Miss Ringwood went up to her room; she leaned her elbows on the little white dressing-table, among the prim wool mats and the little daily text-books, and looked again at herself in the glass. Her eyes were very sad, though no tear stood in them. Presently a smile stirred the corners of her mouth, where a dimple still lingered.

"After all," she said to herself, she is fifteen years older, too."

Then she blushed at the too feminine thought, and the new color in her cheeks became her so that she came away from the glass in confusion.

"But he is just the sort of a man not to care how old anyone was if he loved them."

Then the pretty color faded quite away, and Miss Ringwood went slowly down stairs to cut out petticoats for the Dorcas meeting that afternoon.

III.

For four days Miss Ringwood looked hourly for the rector. He had brought his sorrow to her always; surely he would bring his joys too. Next morning there was a letter. It was not from him; she saw that while yet it was in the postman's hand, for she had been watching at the window, and had run to the door when she saw the postman cross the road. It was from his housekeeper.

"Please forgive the liberty," it said, after decent heading of address, date, and "Honored Madam"—"but master is very bad, and he says 'No doctors.' He has been ailing these three days. If you was to think fit to come over, you might persuade him for his good.—Yours obedient to command.

EMMA WELLINGS."

"I'm going out," she cried to her little maid, "at once."

The shortest way to the rectory lay through the fields, and Miss Ringwood took it. She hurried on through the keen sweet air, devoured by a burning anxiety that consumed all self-consciousness, all personal doubts and dreams. When she saw blue smoke curling from the red chimneys of the rectory above the laurels and cypresses, she quickened her pace, stumbling a little now and then on the rough pasture.

The housekeeper opened the door.

"How is he?" Celia had to clear her throat twice before the words would come.

"But poorly," the woman answered. "He was out up at the Hall Tuesday; and all day Wednesday walking the wet woods, as I knew by the state his boots was in. And then he coughs all night, he does, and the next morning he sends out his breakfast, and so it's gone on; and he won't let me send for the doctor—and—well, yes, p'raps it 'ud be better for you to see him at once."

Celia clenched her hands as she went in. He did not hear her open the door. He was sitting gazing into the fire, with his head on his hand, his elbow on his study table. His head was bowed, and Celia realized for the first time that he was no longer young. He looked, indeed, an old man.

She laid her hand on his arm, and he started and looked up at her with a look of sudden joy and tenderness she had never hoped to see. But it faded at once. "He did not know who it was; he thought it was—someone else," she said to herself, but not bitterly.

"You are ill, and you never sent for me. And you never came, as you promised," she said, with only the gentlest reproach.

"I could not," he spoke hoarsely, and then a fit of coughing took him, and he sank back in his chair.

"But you are ill," she said. "I must send for a doctor at once."

"But he could do me no good. What nonsense it is!" he went on irritably.

'Who told you I was ill? I'm all right, only very tired."

"I've brought you some beef-tea and things."

His brow contracted. "Now, Celia, I will not have it. There is nothing the matter with me." The grieved look in her eyes stopped him.

"You always trusted me before."

"I did—I do—I will! Celia, I went to see her. It is all over. I have wasted all my life on a shadow."

"She does not care any more?"

"She never did care, I think. She did not even know me at first. She only wanted to see the parson about her pew, and sent for him as she sends for anything else she wants! She did not know me at first, and when she did . . . . I have thrown away life, and youth, and hope, and love, everything, everything, for the sake of a woman who never was at all, except in my dreams and my fancy. And there is nothing left in life."

"Poor James!" she said; she had taken off her prim bonnet and seated herself near him. "But all your poor people: you still have them to live for."

"That's what I keep saying to myself, but all the sunshine is gone, and it looks such a long way to the end."

"But it is better to know the truth," she said, rather lamely.

"I didn't know, I didn't realize before, and that was why I couldn't come to you. Oh, Celia, you don't know—I didn't know till just now, all that you've been to me all these years; and but for my own folly and madness you might have been with me, close at my side, all these long, long years, for you did love me once; Celia?"

She was silent.

"At least," he went on hesitatingly, "if you had been my wife you would have learned to have loved me."

"Learned to love you! Oh my dear!"

Her tone thrilled him to the soul. Her head was down on the arm of his chair, and his hand very gently and uncertainly touched her smooth faded hair.

"You don't mean—why, Celia, my dear, my dear!"

For her arms were round his neck, and her face against his, and for that one good minute the long lonely years of sorrow seemed not too heavy a price.

"And now," said Miss Ringwood, lifting from his shoulder a face that had grown young and pretty again—"and now perhaps you will take the beef-tea!"—E. Nesbitt, in the Quiver.

"Love me little, love me long," she warbled. "Yes," said he. "But will you love me when I am short?"—Indianapolis Journal.

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

DOT, THE CHIMNEY SWEEP.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER II.

To this the old lady said nothing, but as the chimney was not properly cleaned she would only pay the regular price.

This satisfied the old chimney sweep, and he was very glad to get away, leaving poor little Dot, as he supposed, in the chimney, where he thought he must have died from suffocation. He resolved to be as far away as possible when the old lady should find Dot stuck in her chimney, and she would either have to bury him, or if she let anyone know about his being found in her chimney she would have to bear the blame.

The swallow said, "The eagle is a friend,"

Dot, meantime, was very glad to follow the swallow into the forest, down a beautiful path and to a clear brook flowing at the foot of a hill. Here he stopped and asked the swallow to wait until he could bathe his face and hands and brush from his clothes as much soot as he could with switches which he would break from the trees.

The swallow said in a very musical voice: "Well, step right into the brook, Dot. You need to be made clean. You can take a bath and throw away your old clothes, as here is a new suit which will just fit you."

Having said this the swallow nodded his head toward a tree at the side of the brook, and under this tree Dot saw a complete suit of finely-made clothing fit for a prince to wear, and perfectly clean and new. Soap and towels were also beside the brook for Dot's special benefit.

The swallow immediately flew away and Dot, after taking a complete bath, felt very much refreshed.

Any boy could not help feeling proud and contented with the new clothes which Dot put on, and now that he was dressed fit to meet a king he hoped the fairy swallow would return so as to tell him where to go.

The swallow soon returned, followed by an eagle larger than Dot had ever seen, such an eagle as you can think about but never find.

Dot was scared when he saw the eagle, but the swallow said, "The eagle is a friend, and you must ride on his back to Baron Blacknose's castle as soon as you have eaten breakfast."

Dot was glad to have a ride on the eagle's back, but as he was afraid of Baron Blacknose he did not want to go to the castle. The swallow told him not to be afraid, for the eagle would take good care that he was not hurt by any one. The swallow showed Dot a nice breakfast hidden beneath a little bush. Both the swallow and eagle waited until Dot had eaten all he wished.

"Now lie flat on the eagle's back," said the swallow, "just as you do when you coast on your sled, and put your arms on the eagle's neck, so as not to fall off." Dot found it very easy to ride in this way, and, being a brave little fellow, enjoyed his ride on the eagle's back even more than a ride upon his father's pet horse.

For quite a while the eagle flew very fast, until through a large open space where the trees had been cut down Dot could see the castle. One end of the castle had a solid wall, with no opening, and on this side Baron Blacknose had not dug any ditch, or moat, as they used to call ditches which were dug around castles to keep the soldiers away from the gates.

The swallow showed Dot a spring and told him to push against it with his finger. As he did so a part of the stone wall moved back so as to leave a place large enough for three men to go through at once.

The eagle staid outside, but the swallow showed Dot another spring which would shut the door which they had just opened, and told him to follow the passage until he could go no farther.

At the end of the passage another spring was shown to Dot, which, when pressed, would open a door in the wall of the room where Baron Blacknose slept.

After Dot had noticed just where the spring was and had found out just how it ought to be pushed in order to open the door, he went back with the swallow and took another ride on the eagle's back.

This time the eagle flew a few miles and lit on the ground, while the swallow told Dot to go forward and meet the soldiers who had camped there for the night.

Dot found the watchman, who took him to the captain and left him there to tell his story. After Dot had told what he had seen and how he had been to the wall of the very room in which Baron Blacknose slept, the captain thought Dot must be crazy.

All the time the swallow had been perched on Dot's shoulder and now whispered to him that he could prove what he had told by agreeing to meet the captain under the big oak tree near the castle.

Dot told the captain that if he did not believe him he would prove his story by riding to the big oak tree on the eagle's back. The captain and the soldiers all knew where the big oak tree was, and they said that if he would do as he had agreed they would follow.

Dot whistled and the eagle came straight to his feet. Then the captain was more surprised than ever and thought Dot's story must be true. On seeing Dot ride over the tops of the trees on the eagle's back he called his men together, and as fast as they could march they all followed to the big tree. Dot and the eagle were waiting for them.

Now, the captain and the soldiers had been sent by the king to arrest Baron Blacknose and his men, but unless they could go when they were not expected they could not get into the castle until the robbers were obliged to go out for food, and as the cattle and food which Baron Blacknose had taken from Dot's village would keep the robbers a long time, the soldiers themselves might first be obliged to leave.

Baron Blacknose knew they were coming; so if Dot had not been there to show them the way it would have been useless for them to try and take the castle.

The captain and his soldiers followed Dot through the stone wall and along the passage. Dot pressed the spring and the wall of Baron Blacknose's room opened, letting the captain and his soldiers in without any noise. Before Baron Blackstone knew what happened they took away the swords and spears and other weapons, and made him a prisoner.

Then the swallow told Dot that only a few of Baron Blacknose's men wanted to be robbers, but that the bad ones had made the rest wicked, just as bad company sometimes makes good boys worse than the bad ones themselves. Most of the men would be glad to be honest soldiers in the king's army when they had a chance.

None of the robbers knew what had happened until the captain and soldiers went through the castle, and as all the spears swords, bows and arrows had been taken the robbers had nothing with which to fight, and all of them were taken prisoners without anyone being killed or even hurt.

They found Dot's father and mother and a good many other people whom Baron Blacknose was keeping as prisoners until someone should pay him money to let them go. Dot and all these people went with the soldiers to the king's palace. The captain told how Dot had guided, them and also that the robbers had known that they were coming.

The captain and his soldiers followed Dot.

The king was so much pleased that he gave Baron Blacknose's castle and lands to be Dot's own as soon as he should be old enough to be a soldier, but his father was to take care of them until Dot was twenty years old, when they should be presented to him

Most of Baron Blacknose's men asked to join the king's army. The king said to the robbers that they might be in earnest in wanting to be honest, but that they had been in such bad company and in such mischief that they must prove their honesty before they could be pardoned.

A few were kept in prison for a great many years and some for only a little while, but all of them were watched and suspected for a long time.

When Dot was twenty years old, he was given the castle and made captain of the Royal Guard.

THE END.

GENIUS AND ITS WORKS.

A poor beggar of Bagdad lay basking in the sun and cursing his fate. A splendid looking man, clad in a gorgeous dress suit, crossed his field of view.

"Drat him!" said the beggar to himself, "I'd like to rip the clothes off his back!"

Instantly the stranger wheeled around and held out a knife, open and keen.

"Do so!" said he.

But the beggar, frightened at being overhead, and awed by the appearance of the stranger, not only refused, but wished himself a thousand miles away.

"You will not?" said the stranger. "Let me tell you something that may remove your scruples. I am one of the Genii condemned by Solomon to go cribbed and confined, with all my natural instincts dwarfed, in this confounded dress suit, until some one voluntarily wished to cut it off me. You are the fortunate man! Only do it and I will make you rich forever!"

But the beggar, thinking the other was making game of him, still refused.

"Come with me!" cried the stranger in an irresistible voice.

They went rapidly through the streets until they came to a miserable looking little hut.

The stranger opened the door with a kick, and, pointing within, said, "Look!"

The beggar, following the direction of the other's glance, beheld a water color painting on the opposite wall. A pea green cow was standing knee deep in a pool of cadmium yellow water. A foreground of vermilion grass stretched away into a middle distance of Prussian blue and crimson lake trees, rearing their lofty heads into a mauve and sap green sky.

Although the stranger knew nothing of art he recognized this at once as a work of genius. He apologized to the stranger for his doubts, and immediately fell to work on the dress suit with his knife.

When the last shred of the suit lay on the floor the stranger expanded to an enormous size. Reassuring the trembling cause of his liberty with a genial glance he said: "And now, good beggar, ask what thou wilt. It is thine!"

"I ask this," returned the beggar, "that my lord will do three posters of this kind a week and let me have the proceeds therefrom. The last census revealed the fact that there were 19,431,817 fools in Persia, not counting myself."

"It is granted," said the genius; "come to this cabin when you will. There will always be a poster ready for you, Adieu! I vanish!"

And he did.

If you think that the begger still sits in the sun and mopes, you are "off your floats," as they say in Chicago.

He now drives three camels and an elephant tandem, and takes the Shah's daughter out for a drive on every pleasant afternoon. Art is one of the few things that can turn chagrin into a Shah grin. It looks like rain. Let us stop.—Truth.

A LAND WITHOUT TAME ANIMALS.—Japan is a land without domestic animals. There are no cows—the Japanese neither drink milk nor eat meat. There are but few horses, and these are imported mainly for the use of foreigners. The freight carts in the streets are pulled and pushed by coolies and the pleasure carriages are drawn by men. There are but few dogs, and these are neither used as watch dogs, beasts of burden, nor in hunting, except by foreigners. There are no sheep in Japan, and wool is not used in clothing, silk and cotton being the staples. There are no pigs—pork is an unknown article of diet, and lard is not used in cooking. There are no goats, or mules, or donkeys. Wild animals there are, however, and in particular bears of enormous size.

The Journal.

FRIDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 4, 1896.

IT WAS BONDSVILLE'S GAME.

Third Game in the Championship Series Unfinished Because of a Kick.

About 1500 persons, including the deadheads on the railroad track, witnessed the third game in the series between Thorndike and Bondsville at Thorndike Saturday. And they not only witnessed a ball game but also a great kick that put an end to the best played game of the season. Both teams were determined to win this game, and were greatly strengthened. Doyle and Nelson of Gilbertville played with Thorndike, and Bondsville had an imported battery from Norwich, Ct., in Lyons and Clabby. The game was close and exciting. Sugrue was hit freely, while Thorndike had difficulty in placing hits off Lyons. Ryan covered first base in superior style, several times saving his fielders errors on low throws. Roche, Sullivan and Nelson excelled for Thorndike.

Thorndike opened the game with Kelley at the bat. He hit a ground ball to Connor and was thrown out at first; Kennedy went out, Nelson to Ryan; Kelliher dropped a pretty single in right field, but Sugrue was third out on a fly to Nelson. Bondsville started in to score the first thing. Connor hit safe; Clabby followed suit and a slow return of the ball allowed Connor to score; Ryan hit to right for a single, scoring Clabby, stole second, but died there as Donovan and Conway fanned the wind in a vain attempt to kill the ball, and Nelson went out on a grounder to first. In the second inning Thorndike evened matters up. Chapman hit safe and stole second; Roche hit safe, scoring Chapman, stole second and a moment later scored on an attempt to catch him napping off the base; Sullivan struck out; Doyle went out to Ryan and Nelson hit a grounder to Donovan, who threw him out at first. In their half Bondsville did one better. Keye hit safe, but was caught stealing second; Shea hit safely, but was caught way off the base and to all appearances was a dead out, but Umpire McCarthy said "nit," and he scored later on a bad error of judgment by Chapman. Lyons had hit safe and was on first, with Shea on second. Connor struck out but Sullivan dropped the ball. Connor was out, as the ball does not have to be held when there is a man on the first and there are not two out. Shea started for third and Sullivan threw to Chapman to touch him out, but Chapman didn't know the game and threw to first to catch Connor, allowing Shea to score. Clabby hit safe, scoring Lyons; Ryan put the ball over the railroad fence, scoring Clabby, while he himself was caught at the plate. In the third for Thorndike Kelley went out, Lyons to Ryan; Kennedy hit to Connor and was out at first, Kelliher flew out to Lyons. For Bondsville, Donovan singled and was doubled up with Conway on the latter's fly to short; Nelson singled, but Keye went out, Sugrue to Nelson. In the fourth, after Sugrue had singled, the next three men went out in order. Bondsville was quickly retired on two strike-outs and a foul to Sullivan. In the fifth neither side scored, although Donovan reached third on an error and a wild pitch, where he was left on Conway's fly to Roche. In the sixth, Kennedy flew out to Donovan; Kelliher got in the way of the ball and went to first; Sugrue hit a grounder to Connor, who picked it up and touched Kelliher as he passed him, and then threw to first in time to retire Sugrue, making a pretty double play. In their half Bondsville had three men on bases with none out, but could not score. In the seventh, after two men were out, Thorndike scored one on errors by Nelson and a hit by Doyle. In Bondsville's half Donovan got in a two-bagger, but was left on second. In the eighth, all the trouble came. Kennedy went out on a fly to Donovan; Kelliher and Sugrue both singled. Here was Thorndike's chance to win the game. Chapman came to the bat and banged a swift line ball toward short. The crowd commenced to cheer, thinking it would go safe and two runs would be scored, but Donovan reached for the ball, and as it went speeding by pulled it in. Kelliher and Sugrue had both started home. The ball was fielded to Connor, and was held on second before Kelliher retouched the base, making a double play. All Thorndike's hopes were crushed. They could not bear to see them spoilt so suddenly, and of course made a big kick. They claimed that Chapman's hit was an infield fly, and that the batter was out, but that Kelliher was safe because he was not touched with the ball. Umpire McCarthy was of the same opinion. Bondsville tried to convince the umpire that he was wrong, but he could not see it that way. After a half hour of wrangling the Bondsvilles picked up their bats and left the field. The score:

Connor, 2,	1	1	1	3	0	Kelley, r,	0	0	0	0	1

Thorndike,	0	2	0	0	0	0	1	0	—3

Earned runs, Bondsville 2. Total bases, Bondsville 15, Thorndike 8. Sacrifice hits, Donovan, Keyes. Stolen bases, Chapman, Roche, Doyle, Connor, Donovan. Two-base hit, Donovan. Three-base hit, Ryan. First base on balls, Keye. First base on errors, Bondville 2, Thorndike 1. Left on bases, Bondsville 5, Thorndike 4. Struck out, Sullivan, Connor, Shea, Lyons, Donovan, Conway. Batter hit, Kelliher. Double plays, Kennedy and Nelson, Connor and Ryan, Donovan and Connor. Passed ball, Sullivan. Wild pitch, Sugrue. Time, 1h 40m. Umpires, J. Donohue, C. McCarthy.

Two well-known authorities were written to in regard to the decision of the umpire, and both say that the umpire was wrong and of course the game is Bondsville's. The Thorndike management erred in allowing the Bondsville team to leave the field. A large crowd had paid to see the game, and when the kick arose most of them believed, and rightly too, that Bondsville was in the right. Base ball in Thorndike will be killed if such kicks are to take place in every game.

District Court.

Judge Robinson was not at all surprised to see the familiar face of Dexter Lombard in the dock Monday morning. "Deck" was not up for drunkenness, disturbing the peace, or assault, but Agent Anderson of the long-named society brought him in to answer to the charge of cruelty to animals. His case was continued for one week. Charles Thompson was also compelled to answer to the charge of drunkenness and making things lively in Monson. As a result he parted company with a ten-dollar bill. Thompson was arrested some time ago charged with attempting to wreck a train on the New London Northern road.

Tuesday a civil case, Michael Cashman against Judge Robinson, in action of contract, was heard, Special Justice McFarland of Wales presiding. Lawyer Gardner appeared for the defendant and Lawyer McClintock of Springfield for the plaintiff. Judgment was found for the defendant. An appeal was taken.

Yesterday Joseph Forest, a Frenchman of Three Rivers, was fined $5 for assault and discoloring the eye of a fellow-countryman.

The repairs on the steeple of the Universalist church have been completed. The steeple has been flashed with copper and the woodwork and the town clock painted. The staging is now being taken down.

A Pretty September Wedding.

The marriage of Miss Charlotte L. Bray, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George L. Bray, to Charles D. Holden of Bondsville, took place Wednesday evening at the home of the bride's parents on Pleasant street in the presence of relatives and a few intimate friends. The ceremony was performed by Rev. F. E. Jenkins of the Congregational church, the Episcopal service, with ring, being used. The bride was given away by her father. The rooms were prettily decorated in green and white, evergreen and hydrangeas predominating, besides which there were cut flowers and potted plants. The couple stood under an arch of evergreen and white asters, on a mat of ferns and hydrangeas. The bride wore a gown of white silk organdie and carried a bunch of 20 Bride roses. The maid of honor, Miss Ella Bray, sister of the bride, also wore white and carried pink roses. The wedding march was played by Miss Jennie Bray, another sister of the bride. The ushers were W. J. Knowlton and C. F. Evans of Bondsville. Light refreshments were served after the ceremony. The newly-married couple left on the 8.51 train for a western trip, to be gone about a week. Both young people are well known and popular in town, and there was a large company at the station to offer congratulations. A shower of rice deluged the bride and groom as they entered the car. On their return they will reside in Bondsville, where Mr. Holden is engaged in business with his father in a general store. There were numerous wedding presents, many of them quite valuable, and included a piano lamp, solid silver, cut glass, hand-painted china, furniture, and $50 in gold. The groom's gift to the bride was a handsome gold watch.

"Eros, Jr.," owned by Dr. S. H. Ellery, took second money in the 2.26 class trot at Ware last Saturday. Doctor Ellery, who was driving the horse, was removed from the track by the judges on the charge of pulling his horse and the third heat was declared no race. During the intermission the judges would not allow the horse to have any water or to be tampered with in any way. In the final heat E. A. Hubbard of Ludlow drove the horse and at the finish it dropped on the track as if dead. Palmer horsemen say that the horse is very speedy.

A young lady who wished to have a little fun at the expense of a newly-married couple who left on an evening train recently, saw a trunk standing upon the station platform which she supposed belonged to them, so she procured some chalk and covered the outside with such marks as "We're just married," "We're happy," etc. It turned out that the trunk did not belong to the bridal party, but was owned by a woman on her way to Vermont. What she said and how she expressed her feelings when she arrived at her destination and saw her trunk will probably never be known.

The season at the opera house will open next Thursday evening, when Hoyt's greatest farce-comedy success, "A Texas Steer," will be given a single performance by one of the best companies which ever appeared in the place. The piece is a satire on the political methods by which statesmen are made and patronage distributed through the country, and the unsophisticated congressman's adventures during his first visit to Washington furnish many funny situations. Nothing keener or wittier has come from Mr. Hoyt's prolific pen than "A Texas Steer." Tickets on sale at Allen's drug store.

A horse owned by Arthur Smith figured in a lively runaway on Central street about 6.30 Wednesday evening. He started near the head of Central street and came through the street at a rapid pace. In front of the Palmer Steam Laundry he commenced to kick and turned a sharp angle, throwing Mr. Smith and his brother Albert, who were in the team, to the ground and overturning the buggy. The dashboard and one wheel on the buggy were broken; the horse was not injured. Arthur Smith was quite badly cut and bruised about the head, but his brother was not hurt. The horse has done this little trick several times, and Arthur Smith is always the one to be injured.

Palmer people who saw Delorme's great painting, "The Blacksmith," when on exhibition at Gill's in Springfield some time ago, will be glad to know that it is again on exhibition in that city, at the store of Forbes & Wallace, and that admission is free. This is a wonderful piece of work; as the blacksmith stands at his forge, intently watching the fire and the iron being heated, the spectator cannot help feeling that the figure must move the next instant, while the realistic hues of the white-hot fire seem to add warmth to the atmosphere. All who have seen it will want to do so again, while it is well worth a special trip to the city to those who have not. The painting will be there only a week longer.

Deputy Sheriff Northrop received a severe cut on his left hand yesterday morning by the broken neck of a glass bottle. He wished to open a bottle of maple syrup at the breakfast table, and being unable to find a corkscrew attempted to push the cork into the bottle with the handle of a knife. The handle was slightly larger than the neck of the bottle, though Mr. Northrop didn't know this until afterward; as the cork didn't go down easily he put both hands on the knife and added his weight by bringing his hands against his breast and bearing down. The neck of the bottle split, and a sharp point cut a deep gash nearly three inches long from the lower part of the outside of the palm across to the base of the thumb.

The work of macadamizing Thorndike street is progressing finely. The coarse stone is in as far as Pine street, and the top dressing has been put on as far as Foster avenue, the work being delayed somewhat by the non-arrival of the fine stone. The grading is completed as far as the upper end of the cemetery. Selectman Brainerd, who has charge of the work, has closed the road to travel, or has attempted to do so, wishing to get the work completed and the surface of the road in condition before allowing travel on it. Signs and horses have been placed in the road near the farm of Charles Foster, with the intention of sending teams around by Shearer's Corner, but drivers persist in removing the obstructions and driving over the place on which work is going on.

A woman giving her name as Mrs. John J. Ballard of Worcester was in town yesterday investigating the death of A. J. Ballard, the tramp who was killed in the freight yard a week ago. Mrs. Ballard thinks that the man killed was her husband, whom she has not seen for two years. Although the man gave his name as A. J. Ballard, he might have been misunderstood and given his name as J. J. Ballard. She last heard of him in Pennsylvania, and heard that he had lost a portion of his left hand. This man had lost two fingers and a thumb while railroading in that state. The description she gave of her lost husband tallied very close with that of the tramp; she also exhibited a picture of her husband taken about two years ago, and the resemblence was quite marked. The body was exhumed to-day for identification.

BLACK DRESS SILKS —FROM AUCTION!

Here's plunder from the auction sale of Hess, Goldsmith & Co's. black dress silks in New York last week. Some of the best of the silks is our share, for our New York office people were on hand. And prices ruled even below usual auction prices at that sale, for we have—

19 inch black faille —to sell at 50c a yard.
75c 19-inch black brocaded gros grain —to sell at 55c a yard.
75c 20 inch black duchess satin —to sell at 59c a yard.
75c 24-inch black brocaded India —to sell at 59c a yard.
95c 24-inch black duchess satin —to sell at 69c a yard.
$1 24-inch black duchess satin —to sell at 75c a yard.
$1 20-in black brocaded crepon —to sell at 79c a yard.

These are all new desirable silks from a manufacturer's stock—nothing wrong with 'em in any way.

But the lots are not large, and that's the worst thing about the bargain, for there is not enough for a tenth of the women who will be after 'em.

NEIGHBORHOOD NOTES.

MONSON.

STRANGE MAN IN HER ROOM.

Startling Experience of a Woman Who Wakes and Finds a Drunken Man on Her Bed.

For nerve under the most trying circumstances Monson ladies gladly yield the palm to Mrs. David B. Needham of Squier avenue. Last Saturday evening she, her little daughter and three child visitors retired at an early hour to their rooms upstairs, and all were soon fast asleep. Mrs. Needham left the street door unlocked and a lamp burning down stairs for Mr. Needham, a clerk in Gage Bros's. store. Between 10 and 11 Mrs. Needham suddenly found herself awake, with a very strong smell of liquor in the room, and someone beside her. As she is unaccustomed to the smell of liquor she was startled; putting out her hand she touched a head covered with thick, wiry hair. This she knew did not belong to Mr. Needham, as he is somewhat bald. She sprang up, and striking a light ordered the man to leave the house at once. When she succeeded in arousing him he was profuse in apologies, but wanted her to assist him in finding his coat, hat and shoes, which he had removed. Mrs. Needham found the hat and shoes, but did not find the coat, and finally got rid of him. When Mr. Needham returned about half an hour later he was so incensed about the affair that he started out to hunt up the man. At last, going to Culey's livery stable he found a man lying there whom he thought might be the one for whom he was looking, although the man wore a coat. Upon being questioned, he admitted entering someone's house earlier, and said the coat he was wearing was one that he found in the barn. He is a South Monson man. Mr. Needham returned home, but did not have a good night's rest, for about 4 o'clock he was awakened by a crash outside. He hurried out and found that a three-horse bus, marked "Century House" had been driven through his yard into George L. Fuller's yard by a fellow who claimed to know what he was about. Opinions contrary to this, however, prevail. The crash was the result of the bus coming in contact with the boughs of some apple trees. Mr. Needham found the horses tangled up in the reins, and the driver in a cranky frame of mind. Mr. Needham was soon joined by George Warriner, and they succeeded in persuading the driver that they were capable of finding the Century Hotel. He was very positive that south was north, and argued the case with considerable force. He even attempted to lead the horses in the opposite direction from which Mr. Needham was driving them. About 4.45, however, the team arrived at the Century. It was currently reported Sunday that the team had taken the Monson baseball players to Stafford and return, and that the players were left at South Monson a little after midnight; also that the driver nearly capsized the party on the way home, and had driven about from midnight until found by Mr. Needham.

Killed by a Cow.

Olaf Johnson, 40, a Swede, was fatally hurt Tuesday afternoon, while leading a cow along the road from the Stebbins farm to his home in Colton Hollow. The animal became frightened and knocked him down. He held fast to the rope, and regained his footing only to be again knocked down and this time trampled upon. A neighbor who saw the man lying there got him into a wagon and started him home. Mrs. Johnson heard the team go to the barn, and next saw her husband crawling on his hands and knees toward the house. With much difficulty she succeeded in getting him into bed, and later she had an opportunity to send for Dr. Jackson, who at once decided that the man's injuries were internal and serious, and called Dr. Fuller in consultation. Nothing could be done for the patient, however, and he died about 6 o'clock last evening. The deceased was a native of Sweden, and came to this country about five years ago. He was employed for some time by R. M. & T. Reynolds, but has lately been engaged in farming. He leaves a widow, a brother in Wisconsin and relatives in Sweden. The funeral will be held at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. Mr. Johnson was instrumental in inaugurating Swedish religious services in Monson.

Drunk and Abused a Horse.

Charles F. Thompson was arrested Sunday afternoon, spent the night in the lockup, and paid $10 in the Palmer court for being intoxicated and behaving in an unseemly manner. With a companion he drove into Monson by the Palmer road. At North Monson it was found that the horse was not harnessed exactly right, that one of the rains had been passed through the throat-latch. When a bystander had assisted the men to fix this, they drove on lashing the horse; this soon became an old story, and Thompson alighted from the carriage and kicked the animal; he then varied the programme by prancing about the road like a jumping-jack, and finally brought up at the Congregational church, which he was determined to enter and preach, but the arrival of the officer caused him to change his mind.

BRIMFIELD.

Interesting Fair Held by the Young People of the Town.

The agricultural fair held at Brimfield last Friday was not only an event of general interest to the townspeople, but it attracted many visitors from neighboring towns. There were about 500 in attendance. The fair was held on the Hitchcock Free High School ball ground, which presented an unwonted appearance with its booths and pavilions and assemblage of people. The ground lies across the brook from the schoolhouse proper, and is a grassy level between the brook and the foot of East hill. The fair had not only a convenient location but very picturesque surroundings, the steep hillside and adjacent orchard-covered slope forming an effective background for the unusual spectacle. The approach to the ground lay through a lane overhung with apple trees, and across a bridge guarded by huge ancient willows, and visitors paid their slight toll of admittance at a gate before crossing the bridge. There was no artificial enclosure, and nothing more rustic and attractive can be imagined than the setting of Brimfield's agricultural fair. A brass band, picturesquely perched on the hillside, awakened unaccustomed echoes through the valley. The music of a band, heard all day over the village, was enough of a rarity to give general delight, apart from the merit of the performance; but the Monson band received deserved praise both for the quality and quantity of its music.

The interest of the occasion lay quite as much in its sociability and in the opportunity offered for renewing old acquaintances, as in the exhibition itself. Everybody shook hands with everybody else, and wondered if it could be in staid, conventional old Brimfield that they were greeting each other at a cattle-show and agricultural fair, sprung up, as it were, in a night. Among former residents of the town present were: Mrs. W. N. Flynt of Monson; Mrs. Lucretia Carpenter, Mrs. Warren and the Misses Warren, Charles Andrews and Mrs. Arthur Carpenter of Worcester; James Blair, Mrs. K. B. Webster, Miss Carrie Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Buxton of Springfield; Frank H. Brown of Portchester, N. Y.; Mrs. Arthur Day of Glencoe, Ill.; Mrs. Frank Boardman of Meriden, Ct.

The exhibitions of all kinds were entered very informally, and given without any especial preparation. People carried convenient specimens of what they had raised, grown or made, and the familiar vegetables, fruit and flowers acquired a new interest when tastefully arranged and exposed to the gaze of beholders inclined to look with favor upon everything exhibited. Although the live stock exhibited was not large, it compared favorably in grade with that of fairs on a larger scale. H. M. Williams of Millbury and George W. Sherman had the best exhibit, and the collection of animals and birds shown by the Flynt Park Co. added much to the interest of the fair. Other attractions of the day were a ball game, potato race, sack race, and hundred-yards dash. The ball game was between the college and Hitchcock Free High School boys, and a nine composed of middle-aged men, self-styled "The Hayseeds." It was won by "The Hayseeds."

The premiums were decided upon as follows:

Mrs. George Streeter had a fine exhibition of jelly, including 8 varieties of apple jelly. Bert Campbell, the village blacksmith, exhibited some horse-shoes of excellent workmanship; Edgar Stanton showed a splendid specimen of quartz crystal found in Stafford, Ct., George Daniels had on exhibition free-hand drawings, and Addie Griggs showed some cotton raised in Brimfield. The guilt made by Mrs. Andrew Stone contained 2030 pieces.

The fair has an interesting history. It had its origin five years ago in a children's entertainment held on the grounds of J. F. Converse, where the young people tried to imitate the country fairs they had attended at Sturbridge and Palmer. The stock exhibited consisted of a pet lamb, a calf and a pig. The next year races and matches added to the attractions of the exhibition, which has increased rapidly in popularity and patronage each year since. The enterprise has continued under the first managers, Masters Albert Converse and George Daniels, who deserve credit for the perseverance and industry shown in carrying it out. They have had much assistance of course from their mates and from their parents, and the parents and friends of other young people in town. The character of the enterprise as a juvenile undertaking should be strengthened and enlarged. Comparatively few of the exhibitions this year represented the work of children and young people. Another year it is to be hoped that there will be many specimens of what they made or raised. The exhibitions should include samples of coyking, drawing, and sewing, as well as fruits, vegetables and flowers, which the young people can cultivate. If a regular organization is formed now, it will have the effect of making the fair a permanent institution which will become a great benefit to the town.

In the afternoon the subject was: "Resolved that labor organizations and unions are a benefit to the employes and employer."

PATRICK CAREY AND FAMILY.

WHY LADIES LIKE COFFEE.

Though Many Admits it Hurts Them.

Many ladies have so great a liking for coffee for breakfast that the meal seems flat and unsavory without it; but the muddy complexion which is almost a sure accompaniment, is a great trial and the question is seriously discussed many and many times over in one's mind, whether it is possible to give over the coffee and gradually get back the lost complexion, or keep on with the coffee and get on with the bad skin and make the best of it

The disordered stomach and liver sometimes bring on more serious troubles. To quit the use of coffee is the only true relief, it contains the same poisonous alkaloids as tobacco, strychnine and morphine, although less in volume. One can use the delicious hot food-drink, Postum Cereal, at meals and never miss the coffee. It browns the deep seal-brown of Mocha and takes on the rich golden-brown of old Java when cream is added. It is made by the Postum Cereal Co. Lim. of Battle Creek, Michigan, purely and wholly of the nourishing grains intended by the Creator for man's subsistence. The pungent taste so well liked in strong coffee is retained in Postum.

Nature quickly recovers when coffee is left off and the natural health coffee is used in its place. Healthful sleep is again enjoyed and nerves, stomach, liver, bowels and heart cease their complaining when the disturbing cause is withdrawn.

These are great big live facts worthy the attention of anyone who cares for the exquisite fun of being perfectly well.

Beware of the fraudulent imitations of the original Postum Cereal Grain coffee. Insist on Postum.

The White Mountains.

The beauty and grandeur of the White Mountain scenery long since made it a noted and popular locality to which tourists and travelers take themselves.

Perhaps the fall months are the best in which to see the glories of the Mountain foliage, for at that time the golden garb which enshrouds it, is in its most splendid state, and the various routes of the Boston & Maine Railroad so thoroughly traverse the region that every portion of importance can be readily seen.

Throughout the whole Mountain region of New Hampshire, many strange, yet wonderful works of nature are to be seen, and the delights which are attendant upon the tours thereabouts, are without number.

A pleasant trip is the ride to the top of Mt. Washington, there to witness a sunrise, or, perhaps a storm. Another journey, the one through the Notch, is one which pleases thousands, while to see the Old Man of the Mountains, or the beautiful Cascade in Franconia Flume are but few of the interesting features which centre hereabouts.

Of the various routes to the White Mountains, perhaps, as popular as any, is the one called the Merrimack Valley Route, which leads along the banks of the Merrimack River and enters the Mountains at Wells River, only after passing for a considerable distance along the Shore of the Lake Winnepesaukee. Another route is the Sea Shore Route, which follows along the Coast to Portsmouth, and from there gradually bears toward the Mountains.

By either route, sections are covered which are abundantly supplied with the most satisfactory specimens of nature's handiwork, and a book entitled "Among the Mountains" issued by the General Passenger Department of the Boston & Maine Railroad, Boston, is sent for two cents to any address.

Condensed Testimony.

Chas. B. Hood, Broker and Manufacturer's Agent, Columbus, Ohio, certifies that Dr. King's New Discovery has no equal as a Cough remedy. J. D. Brown, Prop. St. James Hotel, Ft. Wayne, Ind., testifies that he was cured of a cough of two years standing, caused by La Grippe, by Dr. King's New Discovery. B. F. Merrill, Baldwinsville, Mass., says that he has used and recommended it and never knew it to fail, and would rather have it than any doctor, because it always cures. Mrs. Hemming, 222 E. 25th St., Chicago, always keeps it at hand and has no fear of croup, because it instantly relieves. Free Trials Bottles at Le Gro & Lynde's Drug Store, Palmer; G. L. Always in season, Hopkins' Steamed Hominy (Hulled Corn). Elegant lunch in milk. Qt. can, 10c.

Sent it to His Mother in Germany.

Mr. Jacob Esbensen, who is in the employ of the Chicago Lumber Co., at Des Moines, Iowa, says: "I have just sent some medicine back to my mother in the old country, that I knew from personal use to be the best medicine in the world for rheumatism, having used it in my family for several years. It is called Chamberlain's Pain Balm. It always does the work." 50 cent bottles for sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

In a recent letter to the manufacturers Mr. W. F. Benjamin, editor of the Spectator, Rushford, N. Y., says: "It may be a pleasure for you to know the high esteem in which Chamberlain's medicines are held by the people of your own state, where they must be best known. An aunt of mine, who resides at Dexter, Iowa, was about to visit me a few years since, and before leaving home wrote me, asking if they were sold here, stating if they were not she would bring a quantity with her, as she did not like to be without them." The medicines referred to are Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, famous for its cure of colds and croup; Chamberlain's Pain Balm for rheumatism, lame back, pains in the side; and Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy for bowel complaints. These medicines have been in constant use in Iowa for almost a quarter of a century. The people have learned that they are articles of great worth and merit, and unequaled by any other. They are for sale here by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

From all accounts Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is a Godsend to the afflicted. There is no advertisement about this; we feel just like saying it.—The Democratic, Carrollton, Ky. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Minot's Light.

Spectre of stone! that from thy ocean bed
Pointest their pathway unto storm-tost men,
Beckoning them back to safety's road again
Lest they should break upon that dangerous head
Where Ruin hides with beauty overspread;
Thou stand'st, O stony beacon, like some sage,
Who 'mid the wreck of a tempestuous age
The wild and errant multitude has led,
Staying the turbulant and sifting tide
Of rash opinion or of folly's course,
That vaunts itself with noise on every side,
Like that mad ocean that with restless force
Strikes and forever strikes against the tower
Of Minot's monitor that mocks its power.

Written for the PALMER JOURNAL.

A YOUTHFUL REMINISCENCE.

BY M. K. CROSS.

In a recent communication I referred to my early pastoral life in Palmer and some of the surroundings of Palmer Center as it was in those days. I now recall a little realistic romance of still earlier days, before any of the Palmer people ever saw or heard of the pastor that was to be, which may interest some of them, and which may indicate in some degree the original traits and tastes of one now far along the journey of life, where the circle meets and merges in its perfect round. It will be seen that the tender sensibilities of Robert Burns were not peculiar to him, except in the gift he possessed above others to express them in song. In simple prose many another is as susceptible as he was, and sometimes the story told in that way may be just as acceptable and charming as his.

To the writer this is one of those beautiful, sunny memories of early life which never wholly fade away, even in later years, and which cheer and gladden the heart when things of the present begin to lose their interest, and things to come are brightened by the hope and prospect that whatever was pure and good in the present life shall be eternal in the life beyond. As Browning so vigorously sets it forth in "Abt Vogler:"—

All we have hoped or dreamed of good, shall exist;
Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty, nor good, nor power
Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist,
When eternity affirms the conception of an hour.

One of the most beautiful of Wordsworth's poems, "To a Highland Girl," written when he was a young man, contained a sort of prophecy in the concluding lines, concerning which he wrote forty years later: "And now, approaching the close of my 73d year, I have a most vivid remembrance of her and the beautiful objects by which she was surrounded." The sister of the poet, who was with him when he met the Highland girl, says there were two girls, and so records in her journal: "One of the girls was exceedingly beautiful, and the figures of both of them excited our attention before we spoke to them; but they answered so sweetly that we were quite delighted. I never think of the two but the whole image of that romantic spot is before me, and the beautiful face and figure of the elder comes to my mind whenever I think of the waterfall of Loch Lomond." In one of my editions of Wordsworth there is a pretty picture of this waterfall and of the young girl dipping water from the brook below.

On a fine afternoon in September, 1830, in company with two young ladies—all of us members of Topsfield Academy—we ascended a lofty hill near the village for a social ramble, where we walked and talked or rested on the grassy summit, enjoying the rural scene and the fine autumn weather, chatting about the long, happy years which loomed before us and what we hoped to be and do in those long and happy years. Alas! alas! the years those two bright, beautiful girls, both of them then in blooming health, were to enjoy life and its work were very few. In early womanhood they both sickened and died, leaving only fragrant memories with those who most loved and prized them.

It seems from Miss Wordsworth's journal that the elder of the two Highland girls so enchanted the poet that he forgot to mention the younger one. Of the twain on the hill in Topsfield the elder may have been slightly more interesting to the writer, but not so much so as to obscure or disparage the other. We were all in our teens and had never seen Wordsworth or read his charming poem; but after more than sixty years I can heartily adopt the sentiment of the poet in his concluding words:

Thou wear'st upon thy forehead clear
The freedom of a mountaineer;
A face with gladness overspread,
Sweet looks by human kindness bred.
And I, methinks, when I grow old,
As fair before me shall behold,
As I do now, the cabin small,
The lake, the bay, the waterfall,
And thee, the spirit of them all.

The weeks and months ran by invisibly, and we were soon far apart and had almost forgotten the transient acquaintance in the tide of other scenes and other friends. But the impress of beautiful forms and beautiful souls is not evanescent, and often is as lasting as life itself. And so with F. W. Faber I can say:

New voices murmur in my ear,
New hopes start into life,
And past and future gaily blend
In one bewitching strife.

Waterloo, Iowa August, 1896.

ANIMALS IN HOT WEATHER.

Cats never bathe, though tigers do so regularly in the Indian heats, and will sit for a long time up to their necks in water. But the cat seems to rejoice in any degree of heat, and be willing to sit in a cucumber frame or a greenhouse, or on a lead roof on the hottest days of the year. On the other hand, they become very thirsty in such weather, and in the backs of small London houses climb up to the cisterns to drink. Mr. Hagenbeck, the owner of the Thier park at Hamburg, has found that his polar bears actually enjoy the hottest sun of midsummer and lie exposed to its rays when other animals are distressed by the heat.

On the hottest day which he remembers to have felt in Hamburg he went round the gardens at midday to see if the animals needed any special treatment. Cases of human sunstroke had been dropping in at the hospitals all the morning, and he was not surprised to find both a tiger and a leopard in a fit and almost insensible. But the polar bear had left its inner cage and stretched itself flat on the hot stones, where it could enjoy to the full the excessive heat of the North German midsummer.—Spectator.

BARNYARD ECHOES.—Pruyn—"I suppose, as a matter of fact, a baby is really nothing but a little animal?" Popper—"Yes, the difficulty is to tell what kind." Pruyn—"What do you mean?" Popper—"Well, I can't just classify him when he crows one minute and bellows the next."—Puck.

"Ever try to get a pass over the G., X. and I?" "I should say not. Why, old Simmons, the president, was elected a deacon not long ago, and he refused the place for fear he would have to pass the hat."—Indianapolis Journal.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remidies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

OVER-ATTENTION TO CHILDREN.—Few mothers realize the risk of over-caution and over-attention to their children, after old enough to play and romp about. A child is happier with a few and simple playthings than with a multitude of complicated toys. There is no such good fun or good training as making one's self useful in doing little things like work, and it is cruelty to deprive the child of this pleasure and stimulus. Let the brain and body be trained through hand, foot, and eye. Give the boys a carpenter's bench; encourage the girls to do housework. Where possible, let both boy and girl have a little garden-patch, if only a few feet square, and the care of a few plants. A woman in her home, a man in his garden; this seems to be a fundamental type from which we cannot entirely depart without risk to body and mind. Cheerfulness, sincerity, industry, perseverance, and unselfishness may be acquired by practice and constant repetition, as much as the art of correct speaking or of playing the piano, and are far more necessary to health.

and Medical Institute,

18 VERNON STREET, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Invalids will now be received and treated as inmates at the institution, or as home patients at reasonable rates. Old Dr. Sweet, the World-Famous Natural Healer, Bone Surgeon and Magnetic Physician, whose visits to Springfield the past twenty years and whose astonishing cures in Western Massachusetts yet remain the wonder of the age, has established the above institution in Springfield for the benefit of a multitude of patients residing in this section.

So long have the Sweet Family been identified with the cure of lameness that it is conjectured by many persons that they treat no other ailments, whereas their most startling successes for many years have been the cure of Obscure Chronic Diseases of almost every kind. In order to provide for the foregoing, the latest and most efficient discoveries may be found at Dr. Sweet's Sanitarium, in fact those only employed in the private hospitals of metropolitan cities.

These, united with those wonderful systems of medicine which from father to son have descended from generation to generation of the Sweet family of Rhode Island for more than two centuries; thus equipped is it not presumable that their success in the cure of obstinate types of disease will be more certain than attends the ordinary methods of office or drug medication.

Whether rich or poor, black or white, the stricken invalid needs the best medical service obtainable. The workingman whose capital is in his limbs, his nerves and muscles, how necessary if impaired that it should be strengthened both surely and with the least delay.

Have you not speculated with DRUG TREATMENT long enough? Why not try the private infirmary system, combining the best of all, for a while? Your life hangs upon your decision. Old Dr. Sweet has called to his aid in providing for his multitude of patients,—a proof of his unparalleled success in Springfield, DR. EDWARD RAY, a gentlemen of rare culture and medical attainments, a graduate of Harvard University, with extensive clinical and hospital experience, who has been given charge of the Surgical Department of Dr. Sweet's Sanitarium for the coming season.

This institution is now open to receive applicants for treatment under the famous Sweet Method, providing them with rooms and board at very low rates, with PERSONAL TREATMENT DAILY, or those who desire to visit the institution occasionally, yet live at home.

Persons of VERY limited means are thus enabled to receive the most scientific medical service provided by medical science to-day. The inhabitants of Western Massachusetts may be assured that Dr. Sweet will not rest content until he has provided for the people the MOST EFFICIENT systems of medical treatment extant. Whatever money or ingenuity can procure to make the institution THE FIRST in New England will be cheerfully provided. Success is the SINE QUENON. As his professional duties multiply—as they surely must—experts in the various branches of the "healing art" will be added to his staff. The best is none too good.

Pleased with the "City of Homes" as a permanent place of residence, Dr. Sweet has removed his family hither and indulges the hope that this fact will be appreciated by those wishing to avoid the uncertainty that attends the service offered by itinerant practitioners. Male and Female operators, assistants, nurses, etc., provided. Terms reasonable. Consultation, examination and advice free to the afflicted.

ACCIDENT DEPARTMENT. Athletes, Bicycle Riders and others suffering from sudden accident please take notice. Bring them here. Prompt service.

NAN'S OBJECT LESSON.

Nan was very critical on a certain summer morning.

"I don't like cream toast. I want some peaches," she moaned.

"But yesterday morning you wished for toast," said the mother. "Jane made this on purpose for you."

"It's burned," said the child.

"Oh, no; only browned the least bit too much."

Nan managed to eat a few mouthfuls, but there was a scowl on her smooth forehead, and her face, that could be very sweet, was decidedly sour.

"She isn't feeling very well," thought mamma. "The morning is hot, and she is tired out with school."

This was partly true. But Nan was a robust little body, and easily regained her physical losses. The fact was that she had been petted a great deal and had come to think her wishes ought to be the law of the household.

After breakfast the seamstress, who was making a frock for Nan, required sewing silk and buttons.

The child was asked to go to the store for them. "But, mamma, my toe hurts," was the instant excuse. So Miss Gardner was set at something else until Bob should come up from the office and could be sent on the errand.

At dinner nothing was quite satisfactory. The roast beef was too rare; the pudding sauce too tart. Papa exchanged glances with mamma.

"This must be stopped," he said. But Nan did not understand what they meant.

That evening the little girl went up to papa full of enthusiasm about a little drawing she had made. The father scrowled in a unamiable way, and found all the fault possible with it. Nan tried hard to keep back the tears, but finally gave up and went away sobbing.

"How could you?" said mamma.

In a day or two there was to be a ride into the country, a lunch with a friend and a return by moonlight. Nan supposed that she would go as a matter of course. But she soon found that she was to be left at home.

"It is too much trouble to take you," said papa.

"And your toe," added mamma."

"And the warm weather which you are afraid of," continued papa.

"My toe is better," pleaded Nan.

"But the lunch won't suit your fastidious taste," said papa. The Browns live very plain."

Nan ran sobbing to grandma's room. The dear old lady drew the child within her loving arms.

"Do you not see," said the gentle voice, "that your father and mother are trying to show yourself as in a mirror? Papa found fault with your drawing that you might see how very unpleasant it is to be criticised. You took great pains with your little sketch, but mamma takes pains every day in ordering the dinner, and Jane takes pains in cooking it. You wish to have the pleasure of the drive and the visit; but you do not care to be helpful when help is needed and so give pleasure to others."

The lesson was a very plain one, that even a child could understand. It was hard to see the carriage drive off without her on that bright afternoon; there were tears and sobbing, but the experience was not in vain.

When the father and mother came home that night they found a subdued, appreciative little girl who was very glad to be talked to and kissed, very pleased with the flowers and bonbons that had been sent to her by the little Browns, and very resolute in her determination to be sunny and satisfied with what came to her instead of sour and complaining.—Examiner.

THE AUTHOR OF "ANNIE LAURIE."

The mystery that has surrounded the authorship of "Annie Laurie," most popular of ballads, is cleared up by Frank Pope Humphrey, who relates an interview in McClure's Magazine. Mr. Humphrey says:

It was at Maxwelton's House, Annie's birthplace, that I came across the missing link in the chain of evidence that fixes the authorship of the song upon Douglas of Fingland. Fingland is in the parish of Dalry, in the adjacent shire of Kirkcudbright, and Douglass was a somewhat near neighbor of Annie.

The present proprietor of Maxwelton House, Sir Emilius Laurie, . . . placed in my hands a letter, of which he said I might make what use I liked, and this letter contained the missing link.

It was written in 1889, by a friend to Sir Emilius, and relates an incident which took place in 1854. At that time the writer, whom we will call Mr. B., was on a visit with his wife to some friends in Yorkshire. Mrs. B. was a somewhat famous singer of ballads. A few friends were invited to meet them one evening, and, after the ladies had retired to the drawing room, their hostess asked Mrs. B. to sing; and she sang "Annie Laurie," in the modern revision, just as we all sing it.

Among the guests was a lady in her ninety-seventh year. She gave close attention to the singing of the ballad, and when Mrs. B. had finished, she spoke up: "Thank you, thank you very much! But they're na the words my grandfather wrote." Then she repeated the first stanza as she knew it.

The next day Mr. and Mrs. B. called upon her, and in the meantime she had had the original first stanza written out, dictating it to a grandniece. She had signed it with her own shaky hand. Not being satisfied with the signature, she had signed it a second time.

She explained that her grandfather, Douglas of Fingland, was desperately in love with Annie Laurie when he wrote the song. "But," she added, "he did na get her after a'."

She was not quite sure as to Annie's fate, she said. Some folks had said she died unmarried, while some had said she married Ferguson of Craigdarrock, and she rather thought that was the truth.

Questioned as to the authenticity of the lines she had given, she said:

"Oh, I mind them fine. I have remembered them a' my life. My father often repeated them to me." And here is the stanza signed with her name:

"'Maxwelton's banks are bonnie,
They're a' clad owre wi' dew,
Where I an' Annie Laurie
Made up the bargain true,
Which ne'er forgot s'all be,
An' for bonnie Annie Laurie
I'd lay me down an' dee.'

"I mind na mair.

[Signed] "CLARK DOUGLAS.

"August 30, 1854."

In the common version this stanza reads:

Maxwelton's braes are bonnie
Where early fa's the dew,
And it's there that Annie Laurie
Gie'd me her promise true;
Gie'd me her promise true
Which ne'er forgot will be,
An' for bonnie Annie Laurie
I'd lay me down an' dee.

The music of the song is modern, and was composed by Lady John Scott, aunt by marriage of the present Duke of Buccluch. The composer was only guessed at for many years, but somewhat recently she has acknowledged the authorship.

ONLY THE FIREMAN.

In the brilliantly lighted billiard-room of the Palmer House sat a young man. He paid little attention to the players, but watched the door leading into the hotel office as if expecting some one. Suddenly his face lighted up as a young fellow about his own age entered the room.

"Hello, Tom!" said the newcomer, as he shook hands with the young man who was seated and apparently had been waiting for him, "have you been waiting long?"

"You're a dandy to keep an appointment," replied Tom; "I've waited here nearly two hours for you to play that game of billiards."

"Well, tell the man to bring the balls, and we'll start in. I couldn't get here any sooner. Had a wreck out here on the C. and G. road. Two freights came together and smashed things up so that it delayed our train over two hours."

"Kill any one?" asked Tom.

"Only the fireman," the other replied.

. . . . . .

At 8.30 the following morning the general manager of the C. and G. R. R. entered his office. Seating himself at his desk he glanced hurriedly over a pile of telegrams and reports that were lying there, picked out several of the telegrams, and crossing the hall, entered the president's office.

"Any news this morning?" asked the president.

"Yes," the manager replied, "I've got reports of a bad wreck on the C. and S. division. No. 21, west-bound, and fast stock train No. 36 collided two miles west of Baxter Junction. About 80 head of stock killed and four or five cars of freight destroyed, and both engines badly wrecked."

"Whose fault?" inquired the president.

"The night operator at Avon. He had orders for 21 to meet 36 at Shelby, but neglected to hold 21."

"Anyone killed or injured?" inquired the president.

"Only the firemen on 21. I believe the reports state that he was killed, "replied the manager.

. . . . . .

Over on the West Side, in a cozy little flat, a young woman was busily engaged in preparing supper. She did not seem to get along with her work very fast, as she stopped every minute to talk to a little mite of humanity who watched her movements intently with big blue eyes, the very counterpart of her own.

"Google-Goo," said the baby, with a serious expression on his face.

"Google-Goo will be here in half an hour; and just think, baby, Google-Goo won't have to go away again for nearly two whole days. Won't that be nice? And to-morrow, if you are real good, you, Google-Goo, and I will go down to the park," said the little woman, as she picked up the baby and commenced to waltz around the room."

"Here comes Google-Goo, she exclaimed, as a step sounded on the stairs. "He's a little early to-night."

She threw open the door, and there stood a big policeman.

"Is this Mrs. Allerton?" he asked. She only nodded her head, poor little girl, and couldn't speak. There was no need to ask the big policeman why he was there.

"Bring him up here," she quietly said.

Silently, and with uncovered heads, they carried the burden up the stairs and tenderly laid him on the bed. She did not shriek or cry out. Kneeling, she clasped the poor mangled form in her arms, and, as she kissed the cold face, all stained with blood and cinders, her head sank forward. Tenderly they raised her up, as unconscious as the still form beside her.

"Google-Goo," says the baby.

It was only the fireman.

AN AFFINITY RESPECIED.

He is a very quiet, unexcitable man, and when his friend took him home to see the baby he did his best, though not very successfully, to be enthusiastic. He undertook to amuse the youngster and allowed him to play with the small watch which the jeweler had lent him while his own was being repaired. The baby was so docile in his company that they were left together for some time. He concealed the apprehensions that he felt, and resolved to allow his charge to have his own way without restraint. When the father returned he said:

"What do you think of the baby, now that you are better acquainted with him?"

"You have one of the most intelligent children I ever heard of," was the earnest reply. "You are beginning to appreciate his fine points, are you? Has he been saying 'Mamma' and 'Papa' and 'Day-day' for you?"

"No. It wasn't in any such trivial manner that he demonstrated his mental powers. He has shown a comprehension of relationships and the fitness of things which, though crudely expressed, is something little less than marvellous. I gave him my watch to play with and he swallowed it."

"Great heavens, man! You don't mean to say that the baby has swallowed a watch?"

"Yes. But that isn't what shows his intelligence. Most any baby, if I am not misinformed, is liable to do that if he gets a chance. When that was gone the only plaything I had to offer him was the key that winds it. And I'm blessed if he didn't swallow that too!"—Detroit Free Press.

WANTED A MAN TO RESPECT.—West Virginia, the mountain state, is full of interesting characters. Back of the rather aristocratic little town of Philippi are fastnesses not yet discovered by the onward march of civilization. A well-known politician was canvassing through that section for votes, when he came to a cabin where a young woman was holding a man on the ground by his ears. "Done got enough?" she asked. "I give up," he said. Then the girl released the man, who went away looking very much abashed. "What's the trouble?" inquired the politician. "Thar wa'n't no trouble," replied the girl. "He juss axed me to merry 'im, an' I've allus said I wouldn't merry any man I could whop. Kinder looks like I couldn' fin' one. I've tried mos' of 'em 'round hyar, an' none of 'em ain't any good. I tol' 'em all about it, an' I didn' want ter whop this un much, but he jess went down soon as I tackled 'im. I reckon I'll hev ter be an ol' maid. I kain't abide havin' no man that ain't mo' of a man than me."—Washington Star.

FIGURING IT OUT.—"Father," said the small boy, "a man that drinks whisky to excess is a chump, isn't he?" "Yes—only it isn't very nice to use slang." "Well, if he drinks whisky till he gets a blossom on his nose——" "What of it?" "Then he's a blooming chump, isn't he?"——Washington Star.

"My family, said Miss Antique, "came over with the Pilgrims on the Mayflower." "Did they, really?" exclaimed Hicks. "How interesting! And were you seasick?"—Harper's Bazar.

THE LIVERYMAN OUTWITTED.

Probably one of the neatest bits of sharp bargaining ever enacted took place not long ago between an apparently ignorant German with an abundance of wealth and a sharp dealer in horses. The German wanted a day's outing, and decided that a long drive would suffice for his wants, and applied to the horse dealer for his best horse and trap. The dealer, not knowing the applicant, demurred at supplying his wants. The German, determined to have his ride, finally pulled out a huge roll of bills, and offered to buy the horse and rig, provided the dealer would buy them back at the same price. This surprised the dealer, but not wishing to offend the owner of so much ready money and possibly a good future customer, he agreed to the deal.

The German departed with the horse and rig, and at the end of the day returned them in good condition, expressing his satisfaction at the pleasure the drive had afforded him. The dealer, according to the agreement, paid him back the money, and the German started to leave the place.

"I beg your pardon, sir," exclaimed the dealer, "but you have forgotten to pay for the hire, you know."

"Pay for the hire? Why, my dear sir," coolly replied the German, "I fail to see that. If you will exercise your memory a trifle you will agree that I have been driving my own horse and trap all day, and, now you have bought them back, they are yours. There was no hiring about the matter. Good-day, sir." And he left the astonished dealer to reflect.—Harper's Round Table.

"Look out!" St. Peter slammed the gate, and an instant later there was a crash, indicating that some one had taken a header. "I'll have to keep it shut hereafter," growled St. Peter, "or some of these 'scorchers' will succeed in getting through without showing credentials. That's the fifth one that's tried to-day."—Chicago Post.

The New Woman.

"I'm going to the club, my dear, so don't wait up for me,"
She murmured to her husband just a little after tea.
"How does this suit become me? Get my gloves, and where's my cane?
Now take care of baby, for I'll soon be back again."

"Be careful that you lock the doors, and be a good boy, dear;
Some change? Oh, yes, I had forgotten, but its rather queer.
You seem to be extravagant—I gave you some last week!"
"It all went for the house, I'm sure," he said in accents meek.

"Of course, that is the old excuse; I've heard it, sir, before;
To ask me every day for cash becomes a horrid bore;
We must economize, or else you'll always keep me broke;
There! don't use that old argument, 'tis what I drink and smoke!"

"My club's the little happiness that I have left in life,
You can't be quite so mean as to begrudge that to your wife.
If baby wakes, just feed her; I've my right key, love, good-by;
Perhaps, if you are extra good, I'll bring you home a fry!

"Is there anything I can do, ere I turn down the light?"
"There is," he meekly said, "for I feel nervous, dear, to-night;
Do be so kind, my darling one, if you've the time to spare,
And look under the bed to see if there's a woman there!"

NOTES ON A EUROPEAN TRIP.

GLASGOW, SCOTLAND, AUG. 24 1896.

Dear Journal:—Heretofore you have sometimes published letters telling in brief some of the story of my summer trips, and again I venture to try your good nature

On a hot and humid day of last July I sailed down the New York harbor on a steamer bound for Londonderry and Glasgow. Two Palmer friends came to the wharf to bid me good-by, and when they left—not knowing a soul on the big steamer—a little feeling of loneliness crept over me and I wished some friend was with me to help make merry the trip; but before long I found others alone like myself, and made some pleasant acquaintances.

Down past Sandy Hook and out upon the Atlantic for two days the terrible heat, which afterwards became so deadly, followed us, and not until we had passed Nova Scotia did it really become cool. Then it was cold, and not since then has the heat been at all oppressive.

Ocean voyages are rather monotonous—Breakfast, dinner, supper, lunch and sleep, with some reading, more talking, music in the saloons, thrown in by way of varying the programme; and on Sunday an Episcopal clergyman who had been discovered among the passengers preached to us. The time passed, and one night about nine o'clock someone brought news that a revolving light on the northern coast of Ireland was visible. All went to see it, and the next morning a little after three (the nights are very short up there in the summer) the coast was plain to be seen. Great barren promontories with here and there a neat-looking white stone house, with the land tilled as far as tillage was possible in little square lots called "acres," all surrounded by a hedge; no barns, only stables for the animals, and all hay and grain in stacks.

The sun rose clear that morning, an unusual thing, they say there, and the picture was as pretty and quaint as one could wish: To the north the "paps of Jura" (if I understood the Scotch correctly), two pyramid looking islands rising from the ocean, the very southwest tips of Scotland; on all sides the many shades of green mingled with the yellow groves, and in the background the purple heather on the hills, all lit up by the sun shining through a light mist.

We pass an old ruin, once the home of some lord or baron, then more recent castles and modern houses, and finally land at Londonderry. Here we pass the custom offices and get our first lesson of the foreign hotel system. Called for breakfast and was asked what I wanted, and being told that breakfast must be ordered ordered a steak; washed and asked for the dining room and was told that the breakfast was not yet ready. Had several letters to post, inquired for the post office, walked three or four blocks, posted the letters and returned to the hotel and asked for breakfast. The reply was: "They are working hard on your breakfast, sir; it will soon be ready." It did come finally and was all right—just what I ordered and no more. There is one thing much in favor of the European system, it avoids the great waste of most of our American hotels. And while I am on the matter of hotels, let me say that most of the hotels in Great Britain are very much more homelike than those with us. There are banks of potted plants in the vestibule, and statuary and pictures in profusion, and an absence of the commercial appearance so common with us To one not accustomed to it, the fee system is the most irritating thing about a foreign hotel. Everyone—from the boy who runs the elevator, if there be one, to the head waiter, all—must be given fees, and if by chance or design you omit the fee you will be notified, and in such a manner that you will understand that the fee is only asked as a matter of right; and something you actually owe. Soon I found that the bill could not be settled at the hotel office—the office is not for that. Bills must be paid to the head waiter, and he sees that no fee escapes. He presents a long itemized bill, no fee mentioned, so far as you can read plain writing, but it is there just the same.

But to return to Londonderry and my trip. After a hasty glance at this quaint city, the most important in Northern Ireland, and a walk on its old wall,—for this was once a walled city and is as quaint and interesting as all walled cities usually are, even more so—I got aboard the train bound for the "Giant's Causeway." A large bell is rung and off we go, "lickaty-split," as we used to say. The "Giant's Causeway" is a very interesting place, not so imposing as I had imagined, only very interesting from a geological point of view—rocks piled upon each other and all fitted together with as much exactness as if chiseled out by the hand of man. There are rocks 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8-sided, and the guards show a 3 and a 9-sided one, but I could not feel that these were perfect.

Spent the first night in Belfast. This is a thrifty city, noted especially for its great linen works; was shown through the York Spinning Co's. mill. Went to Dublin that afternoon, and on the way the "Boyne water" was pointed out, the crossing of which by King William made Ireland an English province and established the orange feud, which seems likely now to last for all time, on both sides the Atlantic. By an all-night's ride crossed Ireland, passed the Lakes of Killarney, and about five in the morning reached Tralee, the capital of Kerry County. A boy at the station took my valise and led the way to a hotel, and plied the old-fashioned iron knocker with vigor for about ten minutes without success, when I told him I would wait until the hotel waked up. He left and I waited until nearly seven, having for company the first hour only the jackdaws, whose uncanny appearance and cawing I shall long remember. Went from Tralee to Dingle by railroad, and then drove to Carrig, a fishing village on the very western edge of Ireland. After attending to some business went to Cork, and the following day, Sunday, went to "Blarney Castle," and, of course—well, you all know what I did.

Monday afternoon after completing business, went to Dublin and took the boat for Liverpool, arriving there early the next morning. The great sight in Liverpool is the immense floating docks, miles, I should think, of them. Took ferry to Berkenhead and the train to Chester. This city is very old, founded in the time of Julius Cæsar by the Romans, and portions of the old wall about the city and castle then built remain. The wall has been restored and is now in good repair, and on it stands the tower from which Charles I saw his army defeated on the moor to the north and east. The city is very beautiful, both the new and the old. Went to the bank of the river Dee, and in a small steamer sailed about six miles to "Eaton Hall," one of the residences of the Duke of Westminster, and beautiful it is, both the palace and grounds; and the ride there—on both sides of the river beautiful grounds, elegant boathouses and everything—conspired to make the whole seem a portion of the home of our first parents.

Went that evening to Stratford on the Avon, and stayed at the "Red Horse" inn, a very modest, unpretending exterior, but within a very museum of art and antiquity, presided over by the genius of Shakespeare and Washington Irving. Irving on two visits to Stratford stopped at this inn, and they have several of his letters and other manuscripts. The porch, writing room, and stair and hallways are filled with statuary and paintings of scenes from the plays of the great poet, and portraits of prominent actors and lecturers. The next morning visited the birthplace of the poet, saw the room in which he was born, the desk he whittled in the village school, the chair in which he and his family are buried; saw the font where he was baptized and the record of his baptism and death. The record of his death reads as follows:

"March 1616, Will Shakespeare, Gent."

Went next to Warwick and saw the castle of the "King Makers," so they claimed to be, and so I think they were in the olden days To me this castle was the most imposing and interesting of any I have seen. It speaks the rugged warlike character of its founders. By a little tip to the guard which I do not regret, although there was posted a notice requesting visitors not to do so, I was allowed to go out into the garden in the rear of the castle to get the view most commonly shown in the pictures from the banks of the river Avon, and was shown the dungeon under the castle where so many of the enemies of the Warwicks ended their days on earth.

Went to the ruins of Kenilworth castle, which are mostly of interest because of the associations, but little of the castle remains. Then went to Oxford, the university city, containing twenty separate colleges. The next day visited sixteen of them, most of them briefly except Christ Church College, the one mostly patronized by the nobility, and was shown the bell called "Great Tom," and pictures of Cardinal Wolsey, Paley, Gladstone, and many others of the more noted graduates. In St. Giles park stands the "Martyr's Memorial," erected near the spot where Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer were burned at the stake.

From Oxford went to London and at once out to Bauckhurst Hill, a pretty suburb, where I easily found Mr. J. W. Phelp, who was a few years ago connected with your paper. At his home I was pleasantly entertained during my London stay, and he gave his time to show me "the largest city in the world." We went and went. Mr. Phelp is a great sight seer and very fleet on foot, and he tired me out very completely in two days. I confess it, as did two young men who went with us. They are recent graduates of Union College and were on their way to Constantinople to teach in Roberts College. I first met them in Stratford and liked their appearance very much, and as Mr. Phelp was willing they joined us in seeing London.

We went everywhere—London is a great city; and although Mr. Phelp said there was much he had not shown us we could not believe him. Think we looked into every nook and cranny of that place. Attended service in Westminster Abby and St. Paul's; was shown Billingsgate, a cheap and dirty fish market, whence came the the word now in common use because of the cheap bickerings of the mongers doing business there; went to the Tower and saw the crown jewels, or all of them people are allowed to see; was shown the spot where stood the scaffold on which Annie Boleyn and Lady Jane Grey and others were beheaded As I walked around the gloomy old Tower and remembered what dark and horrible crimes had been prepetrated there in the name of law and government, I could but feel that the world had improved, was growing better and likely to so continue for some time to come.

Could write books describing London, but must not, as time forbids. London is a great city of low buildings. In no place does business seem so crowded as in the lower part of New York and some places in other of American cities; in London it spreads over vastly greater acres. It is a well-governed, orderly city, and finely built in parts, but with the English stability most apparent. The English build for all time, and the buildings look as if their foundations were laid before time began. Went out to Windsor Castle, and as the queen was not at home was shown the public apartments and the stables with the long rows of sleek and beautiful horses.

Left London for Manchester, and rode through a perfect garden all the way. Every inch is tilled almost to the rail, and every tree and shrub trimmed, and everything kept in perfect order. The harvest was nearly completed, but the grass plots were as green as could be. Gave Manchester a hasty visit (it is a rushing, thrifty city) and pushed on that night for Carlisle. The next morning visited the cathedral and the old castle where Mary Queen of Scots was imprisoned. Then on to Melrose and visited the home of Walter Scott, which is still well preserved and beautifully located on the banks of the Tweed. Then visited Melrose Abby, once a beautiful building, but destroyed at the time of the reformation and since but partially restored.

Edinburgh next. This is the most interesting city I have visited. Not large and modern like London, or thrifty and enterprising like Manchester and Glasgow, but with a beauty of situation and architecture not found elsewhere. The old city rises block above block, all substantially constructed, up the sides of a steep hill, on the highest point of which is the castle overlooking the whole and the Firth of Forth. The old city is separated from the new by a deep valley, all beautifully laid out with walks, shrubberies, flowers and statues of many notables, in the center of which stands the

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE MAGIC DIAMOND.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

There once were two brothers of such wonderful size that even Mr. Jones, with his highest heeled boots on, could not reach to their elbows.

They were Good-one and Bad-one.

Good-one was the most powerful, and while he was yet a mere boy he had found a small bottle of magic oil.

When he rubbed the oil upon a finger which he had bruised, Good-one found that he was at once a mighty magician and could change almost anything to something else whenever he liked.

Bad-one, too, saw this and wanted the oil, but could not get it by any means in his power. This made him very angry and jealous.

For some years things went from bad to worse, and the bad giant hated the good one more and more. But one day along by the bad brother's cave came an old peddler who had in his pack three bottles of magic oil.

Upon finding that they were not to be bought, our bad giant picked up the poor peddler and put him down a deep well until he had cut out of the rock a little room or dungeon for him in his own cave.

He put him down a deep well.

Now, Good-one knew all about this, for the fairy blue flies told him everything and could even tell what this wicked brother was thinking. They said that the old peddler must be taken out of the prison room and a bundle which would look like him put in his place.

Good-one went one day and did as the fairy blue flies told him, and nothing at all was said to the bad giant, who was now a magician with three bottles of magic oil. No one except Good-one could hope to defeat him in any way.

When Bad-one saw that the bundle which he thought was the old peddler, did not eat or drink anything, he thought that the old man must be dead.

He was so afraid of being found out that he dug a deep, deep room beneath the path just inside the stone door to his cave and made a trapdoor, so that it would turn if anyone stepped upon it and let him down upon the rock floor below.

No one who fell so far upon a solid rock floor would live to tell anything about what he might have found in Bad-one's cave.

Now, just seven leagues north of Bad-one's mountain was a village of little people, none of whom was more than four feet tall. The river near the village was washing away its bank, and there was great danger that the temple and the houses would all be washed into the flood if something was not done to change the course of the river before the next flood season.

Prince Open-hand, one of the big brother fairies, was trying to help these little people, but the fairies had discovered that it was not best to do for one what one ought to do for oneself. Prince Open-hand merely told the people what to do and how to do it in the best way.

It would be necessary to work all night, he said, and as the sky was cloudy it would require a light.

Now, while the fairies did not have any electric light, they did have an immense diamond as large as a horse's head and so bright that when put on the dome of the temple it would gather in light all day and shine so brightly at night as to light the whole village.

Prince Open-hand planned to go after this diamond, but the bad magician found out his plans and started before the prince could get ready.

He made himself look exactly like Prince Open-hand, even to the putting of a red spot upon his little finger so that he might be sure to deceive Prince Open-heart, who was with the fairy queen guarding the crown jewels.

The good magician knew of this plan, because the fairy blue flies had told him all about it, and he also knew that the bad magician understood that if once he could get this diamond he could enchant the seven big brother fairies besides the fairy queen and the good magician, and could also kill the three eyed, lion faced dog who always, kept one eye open and could see every danger to the fairies.

The good magician made himself invisible and took a swarm of blue fairy flies to tell him all about the bad magician's plan. "You will know him," he said, "because he put the red spot on the left little finger instead of on the right."

When the bad magician arrived, he claimed to be Prince Open-hand, and he told all about how the work was being done at the village and how he had come for the magic diamond

The fairy queen gave a royal banquet, and while the bad magician was eating and drinking Prince Open-band came and was given the diamond. When the banquet was over the bad magician was in haste to leave. He wanted, he said, to put the diamond as soon as possible upon the dome of the temple. In reality, of course, he intended to keep it for himself.

The queen told him that the diamond had already been sent and that when he again arrived in the little village he would find the jewel on the top of the flagstaff of the temple.

At this the bad magician was delighted and thought his plans had fully succeeded. He felt sure that no one knew him and that all he now needed to do was to become invisible and to take the diamond from the flagstaff.

Accordingly he went out upon the roof of the temple and reached out his hand for the diamond. Just then around swung the weather vane and cut off his head.

Now, the magician had three lives, one for each bottle of his magic oil, so as quick as lightning he caught his head in his hand

He caught his head and placed it again upon his shoulders.

and sat it in place again upon his shoulders

"That is only one life gone," said he, "and I will try again." At his next attempt he succeeded in obtaining the stone, and he ran with it to his cave.

Now, the good magician, who was also invisible, had been standing all this time on the roof of the temple beside the bad magician. He was standing there to guard the diamond, and while Bad-one was catching his head Good-one had taken the real magic diamond in his hand and had put a large quartz crystal in its place, so that is what the bad magician really got when he thought he was stealing the magic diamond.

By the time Bad-one had reached his cave he was so much excited that he tried to open his stone door the wrong way, and, the act once done, the only way to overcome the enchantment was to leave one of the bottles of magic oil outside the door.

Accordingly as soon as Bad-one had gone into his cave he took one of his bottles of magic oil and came out with it, carefully closing the door behind him. He placed the bottle under a wild rose bush some distance from the entrance and then opened the door correctly The other two bottles of oil he set upon a stone shelf, and in doing so he walked over his trapdoor, when down, down, down he went and lost his second life in his own trap.

He had forgtton that the changing of the outside door had also changed the trapdoor.

"Never mind," said the bad magician, "this is only my second life, and I will be more careful in the future." So he picked himself up, and, finding a magic drill, he bored a hole through the side of the cave and in less than a week had come out on the other side of the mountain.

When he had walked around the mountain, he was so surprised to discover that some one had found and taken away his bottle of magic oil that he went into the cave forgetful of everything else, and down, down, down he went through his trapdoor again, and as this was his third life of course he is there now, for no one, surely not I, would care to bring him out again.

A CONFUSING OCCASION.

Willie Washington was gazing into space with a look of intense anguish.

"What is the matter, Willie?" said one of his friends. "Have you been having trouble?"

"Ya-a-s. I'm afwaid that I've gone and made myself verwy unpopular with Mr. Van Diggles and his wife, don't you know."

"In what way?"

"Why, don't you know they both wide a bicycle."

"Yes."

"In costume."

"Certainly."

"And I met them this afternoon. They passed one aftah the othah."

"And didn't you speak to them?"

"Y-a-a-s. I wish I hadn't, foh do you know, everwy time I think the mattah over I'm half convinced that I lifted my hat and bowed to Van Diggles and said 'Hello, old man,' to his wife."—Washington Star.

RED HAIR.

The New York Recorder makes bold to say:—Red-headed boys are smarter than most other boys and can carry a lot more freckles.

The hair that calls for a white horse is, of course, horse reddish. It goes with a tart temper, too.

Red hair, when worn by young ladies, develops a good deal of electricity. You can't help noticing the sparks.

Red-headed girls would be nicer than other girls if it wasn't for the fact that the other girls are just as nice as can be.

The lover says, "In your sunny tresses, dear, the warm light loves to linger." The husband says: "Say, Bricktop, will you sew on this button?"

Red hair is of great advantage to a pugilist. It denotes an oratorical temperament. Cicero was red-headed, or else he wasn't, one or the other.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

"What are you going to do with that Bible, Marjorie?"

"Why, mamma, I've lost my slate pencil, an' I'm just goin' to hunt through the Bible. I've looked everywhere else. Up in the country last week grandma lost her specks, an' grandpa told her to search the scriptures. Then grandma opened the old Bible an' there they were."

Marjorie sat down on the floor with the book in her lap, and for ten minutes gravely leafed it through. Not finding her slate pencil, she put the book away, saying thoughtfully:

"I guess country Bibles has more things in 'em than city ones, 'cause they're older an' lay 'round handier."—Judge.

WORKING A NEW LINE.—"Wilt thee give me a little food?" said a dilapidated looking tramp to a good old lady who was standing in the door of a residence on Capitol Hill last Tuesday evening. The old lady was of a Pennsylvania Quaker family, and her heart warmed toward the needy stranger at once. "Certainly, my poor man. Go to the basement door, and I'll help thee," and she hurried down stairs to have the servant get together some luncheon for him. She took the things to the door; and after getting away with two large sandwiches, a piece of pie and a cup of tea, the man began in a pleading voice again: "Wilt thou be kind enough to give me a little money to help me on my way home—Philadelphia?" "I would willingly, my poor man," responded the lady, "but I have no money with me. But wait," as a thought seemed to strike her. "I'll give thee a note to my son at his office downtown." The tramp failed to get the note, however, for his next question brought the interview to an abrupt end. "Where will I find thou's son?"

LABOR DAY BICYCLE RACES.

Good Weather, Large Attendance, and Exciting Contests.

The principal feature of the observance of Labor Day was the bicycle meet held on the driving park in the afternoon by the Palmer Race Meet Association, which was witnessed by upwards of 1500 people. The management had labored hard to make the meet a success, and their efforts were well repaid. They were favored with fine weather, the day being all that could be asked for. The rain of the preceding day had placed the track in poor condition and the management had the steam roller at work all the morning trying to get it in good order, but in spite of all their labor and expense the track was uneven and heavy, and considering this fact, fast time was made. J. T. Kelleher of Springfield was the hero of the day, winning first in the mile and the half-mile open. F. J. Grady of Chicopee and W. J. Knowlton of Bondsville also rode in good form and captured several prizes. E. D. Tufts was pacemaker and made the riders hustle to keep with him. The Monson Cornet Band furnished music between the events.

The one mile open was the first event, and was run in two heats. In both of these the riders loafed until the homestretch. Minie, Knowlton, Grady, Fryeberg, Vincelette, Kelleher, Parsons and Olson qualified. In the final Kelleher got behind the pacemaker at the start and held that position until the finish, crossing the tape first, closely followed by Grady and Fryeberg. Knowlton made a big spurt from the rear and finished fourth; time, 2 27 1-5.

Two heats were run in the one mile 2 45 class, Minie, Knowlton, Grady, Olson, Vincelette, Bush, Russell and McLane qualifying. In the second heat Wells lost control of his wheel and ran into Landry near the finish, throwing both riders to the ground and breaking Landry's wheel. On account of being fouled the judges allowed Landry to participate in the final, which was won by F. J. Grady, with Knowlton a close second and Vincelette third; time, 252 2-5.

In the half-mile open the heats were run off in good time, and in the final Tufts pulled the field of riders around at a rapid gait. Kelleher, Grady and Minie had a close fight for position on the stretch, finishing in the order named above; time, 1.11 1-2.

The prettiest race of the day came next, the two-mile handicap, which was run in two heats and a final. In the first there was no scratch man, Knowlton on the 50-yards line being the nearest man to the tape. At the crack of the pistol all the riders got off in good form. Knowlton caught the bunch at the sixth quarter and trailed along in the rear until on the last turn, when he pulled ahead and by a magnificent spurt crossed the tape first amidst loud cheers from the grandstand. Olson, Fryeberg, Granger, Lapham and Bush also qualified. In the second heat Kelleher was scratch man. He caught the bunch on the first half, when his tire went down. He finished on a flat tire but qualified, as only six finished. The final heat was exciting. Kelleher, Minie and Knowlton caught the bunch on the first quarter, and trailed along in the rear until the last quarter. Then as they came around on the last heat the band struck up a lively tune and the spectators in the grandstand arose in a body. Parsons and Minie pulled out from the bunch and started for the tape. Knowlton, who was in a pocket in the rear, dropped behind at the mile and three-quarters to get out, and then made a big spurt around the outside of the bunch and if the tape had been a few yards further would have won. Parsons finished first, with Minie second and Knowlton third; time, 5.20.

Soon after W. J. Knowlton of Bondsville attempted to lower the half mile record, unpaced, made by tandem riders Evans and Kent, in 1.02. He was given a round of applause as he crossed the tape and rode a beautiful half, the time being 1.08, which was excellent considering the heavy track. George L. Bates of Springfield, professional, then rode an exhibition half. He was well paced and made it in 1.05, but his work did not compare with that of Knowlton, who, in addition to riding unpaced, had just before his attempt ridden a hard two-mile race.

PASSENGER TRAIN WRECKED.

On the Athol Road At Red Bridge—Several Hurt, None Seriously.

A collision took place on the Athol branch of the Boston and Albany railroad near Red Bridge Tuesday evening, when a locomotive backing out from Springfield to bring in a disabled freight train at North Dana crashed into passenger train No. 475, in charge of Conductor A. S. Bennett, which is due in Springfield at 5.38 p. m. The passengers were badly shaken and thoroughly frightened. Several were badly bruised, the worst injured being Mrs. Jane B. Slate, 48 Auburn street, Springfield, chest strained, possible internal injuries; W. L. Swan of Athol, bad scalp wound; Mrs. Mary Malone of Carew street, Springfield, right shoulder wrenched.

Freight train No. 473 broke down at North Dana, and engine 118, in charge of Engineer George Mayo and Fireman W. W. Brackett, was sent out to bring it in, with orders to look out for every train except the freight. The engineer thought that he was to bring in the passenger train, and so had a right to the track. The passenger train was all right, and was approaching the flag station at Red Bridge on time, slowing down a little to take on a passenger who had flagged the train, when engine 118 dashed around the curve, which is very sharp at this point, going at the rate of twenty miles an hour. Both engineers saw the danger, applied the brakes and reversed their engines, and with the firemen jumped for their lives. The engines slacked up a little, then came together with a thundering noise which was heard two miles away. One of the whistle valves was thrown out of order by the shock, and the engine shrieked for a time as if it realized what had happened. The windows in the passenger coaches were shattered, and the passengers suddenly assumed different postures from those which they were in a few moments before; all were more or less badly shaken up, and several women had to be carried from the car. Great confusion and excitement prevailed. Passenger engine No. 264 was badly damaged. The front was battered in, the heavy castings underneath the boiler broken, and the cow-catcher completely demolished. The cab of the engine 118 was torn to pieces and the tender stove in. The forward truck of the engine 264 was derailed. Both engines will spend considerable time in the repair shop before doing further service. Word was sent to Springfield and a special train was run out, and the waiting passengers taken to that city. The wrecker with Division Superintendent Sackett arrived about 10 o'clock and cleared the tracks so that the 6 40 train for Athol, which was delayed at Collins, got through after midnight.

Many people from the surrounding vicinity were attracted to the scene of the wreck, and various rumors were afloat as to the number killed and wounded. It was fortunate that a passenger had signaled the train to stop, otherwise it would have been going at a much faster speed and the collision would have been productive of terrible results. If the engines had met with much greater force the passenger train would probably have been dashed to the river below and many lives lost.

J. W. Cheney of Three Rivers, while driving from that village to Palmer this morning lost a valuable overcoat. He did not ascertain his loss until he reached Palmer, and immediately drove back to Three Rivers, but was unable to find it.

Shaw—Burnett.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. George M. Shaw on Park street was the scene of a pretty home wedding last Saturday afternoon, when their daughter, Lucy Hattie, was married to William Chester Burnett of Boston. The house was tastefully decorated with ferns, golden-rod and potted plants, and the ceremony was performed with a ring by Rev. F. E. Jenkins of the Congregational church. Miss Ethel Beecher of Springfield, a niece of the bride, was flower-girl, Mr. Emil Jean of Leicester was best man, and Miss Mary Ashworth of Rochdale, a cousin of the bride, was bridesmaid. The bride was given away by her brother, James O. Shaw. She carried a bunch of 20 roses, denoting her age. The wedding march was played by Miss Vera Tryon. Immediately after the ceremony refreshments were served. The bride was prettily dressed in white, trimmed with lace and ribbon. The bridesmaid and flower-girl also wore white. The bride's traveling dress was of gray henrietta, trimmed with silk and lace beads. There were numerous wedding presents, including some handsome silver. Mr. and Mrs. Burnett left on the evening train for a stay of a week in the vicinity of Albany. They will board with the bride's parents until spring, when they will go to housekeeping in Boston.

A Chicago man, formerly a resident of a near-by town whose local happenings are weekly portrayed in this paper, writes as follows: "I am a subscriber of the JOURNAL, and will say if it cost $10 per year I should take it and call it cheap for the money—could not do without it."

All who intend to support the Republican nominees are invited to join the club; the headquarters are in Lynde's block on Main street.

A team occupied by several ladies backed into another team on the park after the races Labor Day, locking the wheels together. The horse that was hitched to the wagon backed into jumped, breaking a wheel, and promised to make things interesting, but was quickly seized and held by bystanders. No damage was done except the breaking of the wheel.

At the time no particular case was designated or shown to the persons ordering. The beer was delivered in Bondsville by an agent of Keye's. The defense claimed that the sale was made in Belchertown, while the government contended that the delivery marked the place of sale. Keye was found guilty and fined $100. He appealed and furnished $300 bail.

The quietness which prevails in Palmer on the Sabbath was broken at 5.40 last Sunday afternoon by the wild ringing of the fire alarm, which startled all the people, and although it was raining hard at the time many went to the engine house, thinking that some large fire was in progress from the manner in which the alarm rang. It struck all the numbers from one to a hundred, and did this with such rapidity that people thought that some evil power was in possession of a box and was ringing the alarm. The trouble was finally located in front of the Cross block on Main street, where broken insulators had let electric light and fire alarm wires came in contact with the tree. The insulation on the electric wires had become worn off by rubbing against the tree, which was thoroughly wet by the storm, and though the wires did not touch each other the wet bark of the tree furnished a fine conductor for the fluid from the electric to the fire alarm wire. The tree was set on fire in several places, and large holes burned in it. A lineman attempted to climb the tree before the current was shut off at the electric plant, but the tree was too thoroughly charged, and he waited until word was sent to the power house and that circuit had been switched off.

District Court.

A large number of offenders have been before the court this week. Tuesday morning the dock was full waiting for justice to be dispensed. Irwin Brown of Holyoke was arrested by Deputy Sheriff Northrop charged with the larcency of a whip and horse blanket from H. J. Bradway of Fosket's Mills. He pleaded not guilty and proved beyond doubt that he was not concerned in the affair, and was discharged. John Comelde, a Polander from Bondsville, paid $5 for being drunk and assaulting his wife. Frank Shannon, Albert Bonzelay and Edward Mullen, hardened Coxeyites, arrested by Sheriff Studley Saturday afternoon charged with track walking, pleaded guilty and were fined $5 each, being committed in default of payment. Then last, but not least, came Dexter W. Lombard, charged with cruelty to animals. "Deck" owns two horses. He evidently feeds them too much and spends too much time in caring for them, for they are very poor and are galled about the shoulders, and no other cause can be assigned but that they eat so much it makes them poor to carry it around, and that they are cleaned so often and with such vigor that their hide is rubbed off. They are not fast enough for "Deck," and at times he whips and beats them, besides speaking loud encouraging words to get more speed out of them. "Deck" has carried this too far, and as a result he was once more in court. He wavied examination and was found guilty, and will be given sentence to-morrow at 9 a. m.

Baseball.

The Bondsville baseball team defeated the Three Rivers team at Bondsville Saturday in an uninteresting game. The score was allowed to run up, and Bondsville batted the Three Rivers' pitcher almost at will. Kee was also touched up lively at times. Moriarty and Lane batted well. Kee made a home run. The score by innings:

House Burned.

The house belonging to and inhabited by David Downey was burned to the ground Friday evening. The fire started about 10 o'clock, and it is supposed that the roof caught from the chimney. The alarm was given soon after the house took fire, and the children were removed without any danger. Nearly all the furniture was saved. The ceremony took place at 9 o'clock, nuptial mass being celebrated by Rev. Thomas O'Keefe. The ushers were brothers of the bride, William J. of Dorchester, and Richard. The bridesmaid was Miss Margaret Doyle, and the best man Matthias Casey. The church was decorated with flowers, principally asters, large bunches being upon the altar, and at the feet of Our Lady of the Sign of the Cross, and St. Joseph. The bride was becomingly attired in brown and pearl changeable French novelty goods, with white satin and pearl trimmings, and wore a large white hat ornamented with ostrich tips and ribbon bows. She carried a mother-of-pearl rosary, a wedding gift from her brother William. The ceremony was followed by a reception at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Mary Doyle, on Green street, from 10 until 2. Breakfast was served. Mr. and Mrs. Welsh received hearty congratulations, and the large number of gifts testify to the regard in which they are held. They are spending 10 days in Boston, after which they will board with Mrs. Doyle.

Fourscore of Years.

William King celebrated his 80th birthday on Tuesday and received a number of letters of congratulation. Mr. King is a native of Monson and has spent his entire life here. He belongs to one of the oldest and most prominent families. Mr. King's life until some 25 years ago was spent on a Sand Hill farm, since which time he has owned a pretty house on Main street. It was there that his wife, Caroline Woodworth, died in 1881, leaving four children, Mrs. James V. Squier of Hartford, Ct., Mrs. R. Clark Pease, Mrs. William K. Flynt, and Fred W. King of Chicago, Ill. Since the death of Mrs. King Mr. King has lived alone. He says that he is perfectly well, and that he attributes his good health in part to the regular hours he has kept, and to good habits in general. He also lays much stress upon the laws of heredity.

Norcross started to cross Main street wheeling her baby, a bicyclist came scorching along and without warning ran into the baby carriage, which was overturned and the baby thrown out. He seemed considerably worried over the affair, and waited about to learn Dr. Rand's opinion in regard to the baby.

Late last Saturday evening while Everett Thompson of South Monson was driving a horse hired of Liveryman Curley back to the stable, the carriage struck an electric light pole, the horse bolted, and Mr. Thompson was thrown over the dashboard, but not hurt beyond a few scratches. The horse freed himself from the carriage and ran up the Wales road, and Mr. Thompson, supposing that he had continued in that direction did not follow, but turned his attention to getting the carriage home. The drawbar was broken, but the damages were slight otherwise. In the morning the horse was found standing in a yard, only a short distance from the scene of the accident. No blame is attached to Mr. Thompson, for the darkness was intense.

When your stomach begins to trouble you, it needs help. The help it needs, is to digest your food, and, until it gets it, you won't have any peace. Stomach trouble is very distressing, very obstinate, very dangerous. Many of the most dangerous diseases begin with simple indigestion. The reason is that indigestion (not-digestion, not-nourishment) weakens the system and allows disease germs to attack it. The antidote is Shaker Digestive Cordial, strengthening, nourishing, curative. It cures indigestion and renews strength and health. It does this by strengthing the stomach, by helping it to digest your food. It nourishes you. The Men's Sunday Evening League of the East Congregational church has again resumed charge of the Sunday evening services, and will endeavor to make them not only attractive but profitable. Last Sunday evening was especially so, and the League is to be considered fortunate indeed on the first evening of again resuming this special feature of these meetings in having with them such an acceptable soloist as Miss Pelton of the Central church, Worcester, proved herself to be. She has a very sweet and sympathetic voice, and her enunciation almost perfect. All her selections were rendered well, and this may be said in an especial manner of her solo from Handel's Messiah, "Come Unto Him," into which she put real invitation and great tenderness. For most Sunday evening's service the League has secured as soloist Miss Lillian L. Lapham, contralto, of Springfield, who will sing "The Plains of Peace," by D'Auvergne Bernard; "Oh Jesus, Thou Art Standing," by Adam Geibel; "The Holy City," by Stephen Adams.

Fatally Injured by a Locomotive.

Patrick McAuley, while crossing the tracks of the Boston and Maine railroad last Friday afternoon, was struck by an engine which was backing into the Otis Co's. yard, which ran over and cut off his left leg below the knee. He did not see the engine or hear the warning of others who were near. He was attended by Drs. Blodgett and Ryan, who amputated the limb above the knee and did all that was possible for him, but he never rallied and died early Saturday morning. A widow, two sons and two daughters survive him. The funeral was held Monday from All Saints' church.

Condensed Testimony.

Chas. B. Hood, Broker and Manufacturer's Agent, Columbus, Ohio, certifies that Dr. King's New Discovery has no equal as a Cough remedy. J. D. Brown, Prop. St. James Hotel, Ft. Wayne, Ind., testifies that he was cured of a cough of two years standing, caused by La Grippe, by Dr. King's New Discovery. B. F. Merrill, Baldwinsville, Mass., says that he has used and recommended it and never knew it to fail, and would rather have it than any doctor, because it always cures. Mrs. Hemming, 222 E. 25th St., Chicago, always keeps it at hand and has no fear of croup, because it instantly relieves. Free Trials Bottles at Le Gro & Lynde's Drug Store, Palmer; G. L. Low Rates to the White Mountains.

The wealth of natural beauty and the many pleasing associations surrounding the White Mountains, make it a valuable yet interesting locality to visit. Marvelous are the works of nature which are displayed, and in many cases of so curious a construction, that to one who has never visited this region there is a store of delights which has few, if any, equals. The lines of the Boston & Maine Railroad so thoroughly cover the Mountain regions of New Hampshire, that every point of interest is within easy access. To permit the thousands who desire to visit this land of Paradise, the Boston & Maine Railroad will, during the period from September 10th to October 10th, greatly reduce its rates to Mountain points. These tickets will permit holders to stop over at any point north of Plymouth or North Conway, and side trips to the Summit, to Maplewood, Profile House and nearly a score of other points will be on sale at Fabyans and Bethlehem Junction. Information can be obtained at station ticket offices, or at the Boston City Ticket Office, 322 Washington St., corner of Milk St.

Sent it to His Mother in Germany.

Mr. Jacob Esbensen, who is in the employ of the Chicago Lumber Co., at Des Moines, Iowa, says: "I have just sent some medicine back to my mother in the old country, that I knew from personal use to be the best medicine in the world for rheumatism, having used it in my family for several years. It is called Chamberlain's Pain Balm. It always does the work." 50 cent bottles for sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

In a recent letter to the manufacturers Mr. W. F. Benjamin, editor of the Spectator, Rushford, N. Y., says: "It may be a pleasure for you to know the high esteem in which Chamberlain's medicines are held by the people of your own state, where they must be best known. An aunt of mine, who resides at Dexter, Iowa, was about to visit me a few years since, and before leaving home wrote me, asking if they were sold here, stating if they were not she would bring a quantity with her, as she did not like to be without them." The medicines referred to are Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, famous for its cure of colds and croup; Chamberlain's Pain Balm for rheumatism, lame back, pains in the side; and Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy for bowel complaints. These medicines have been in constant use in Iowa for almost a quarter of a century. The people have learned that they are articles of great worth and merit, and unequaled by any other. They are for sale here by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

From all accounts Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is a Godsend to the afflicted. There is no advertisement about this; we feel just like saying it.—The Democratic, Carrollton, Ky. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

Diffuse Help!

In this way. When you see how Pearline has helped you, tell others and let it help them. Where a woman is trying to do housework in the old, hard-working, rubbing way, it's actual charity to tell her about Pearline. Perhaps she uses it for scrubbing, washing dishes, etc., but can't believe that in washing clothes it can save so much work and wear without doing harm.

Your personal experience might convince her. That would help Pearline, to be sure—but think how much more it would help her, by saving time and strength and real money. 433 JAMES PYLE, N.Y.

HOW THE DAY WAS WON.—"Sire," quoth the chief of staff, "the Amazons are assembling on the right wing and evidently intend to turn our left with a vigorous charge."

"Do you mean the Amazonian wheel corps?"

"Yes, sire, and they are a gallant sight. Their wheels have all been renickled, and they have donned their new ashes-of-roses bloomers for the first time. What shall we do to avert the danger?"

"Order out the royal sprinkling carts."

"Yes, sire."

"Let them make the battle ground in front of our left wing as muddy as possible."

"Yes, sire."

"Just as soon as the charging Amazons in their new silk bloomers strike that mud they will whirl about and ride back as fast as they can pedal."

"For what, sire?"

"For their mud guards, stupid. Then, if we advance rapidly enough to surprise them before they can get their hemlets on straight the day is ours!"

And it was even so.—Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

A MECHANICAL HORROR.—Machinery is a monthly journal published at Johannesburg, South Africa. In the October number is an account of a most remarkable clock belonging to a Hindu prince, which visitors think the strangest piece of machinery in India. Near the dial of an ordinary-looking clock is a large gong hung on poles, while underneath, scattered on the ground, is a pile of artificial human skulls, ribs, legs and arms, the whole number of bones in the pile being equal to the number of bones in twelve human skeletons. When the hands of the clock indicate the hour of 1, the number of bones needed to form a complete human skeleton come together with a snap; by some mechanical contrivance the skeleton springs up, seizes a mallet, and walking up to the gong, strikes one blow. This finished, it returns to the pile and again falls to pieces. When 2 o'clock, two skeletons get up and strike, while at the hours of noon and midnight the entire heap spring up in the shape of twelve skeletons, and strike, each one after the other, a blow on the gong, and then fall to pieces, as before.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remidies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials Address,

Why

Do people buy Hood's Sarsaparilla in preference to any other,—in fact almost to the exclusion of all others?

Because

They know from actual use that Hood's is the best, i. e., it cures when others fail. Hood's Sarsaparilla is still made under the personal supervision of the educated pharmacists who originated it.

The question of best is just as positively decided in favor of Hood's as the question of comparative sales.

Another thing: Every advertisement of Hood's Sarsaparilla is true, is honest.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the One True Blood Purifier. All druggists, $1. Prepared only by C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

HE REALLY COULDN'T AFFORD IT.

This is the story of Mr. G. of Chicago, as told by a local paper. For a long time he had been in the habit of giving a certain chronic beggar a dollar on stated occasions. But when he called recently Mr. G. gave him only half a dollar. The beggar took it, thanked the donor and turned toward the door. Before reaching it, however, he seemed to be considering a matter very seriously. He hesitated, stopped, and then turned to Mr G. again, saying: "Excuse me, sir, I would like to ask you a question." "Well, what is it?" asked Mr. G. "It is this: Every month for years past you have given me a dollar, but to-day I come and you give me only 50 cents. How is that?" "Well, I'll tell you," said Mr. G., smiling. "I have had some unusually heavy expenses this month. My oldest daughter got married, and the outlay for her trousseau, etc., has compelled me to retrench in every direction." "Ah, yes. I see," said the beggar. "But, Mr. G., I really can't afford to contribute toward your daughter's wedding expenses."—New York Tribune.

GRAND OPENING OF THE FALL AND WINTER SEASONS,
Monday, August 31st, 1896,
OF OLD DR. SWEET'S SANITARIUM
and Medical Institute,
18 VERNON STREET, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Invalids will now be received and treated as inmates at the institution, or as home patients at reasonable rates. Old Dr. Sweet, the World-Famous Natural Healer, Bone Surgeon and Magnetic Physician, whose visits to Springfield the past twenty years and whose astonishing cures in Western Massachusetts yet remain the wonder of the age, has established the above institution in Springfield for the benefit of a multitude of patients residing in this section.

So long have the Sweet Family been identified with the cure of lameness that it is conjectured by many persons that they treat no other ailments, whereas their most startling successes for many years have been the cure of Obscure Chronic Diseases of almost every kind. In order to provide for the foregoing, the latest and most efficient discoveries may be found at Dr. Sweet's Sanitarium, in fact those only employed in the private hospitals of metropolitan cities.

These, united with those wonderful systems of medicine which from father to son have descended from generation to generation of the Sweet family of Rhode Island for more than two centuries; thus equipped is it not presumable that their success in the cure of obstinate types of disease will be more certain than attends the ordinary methods of office or drug medication.

Whether rich or poor, black or white, the stricken invalid needs the best medical service obtainable. The workingman whose capital is in his limbs, his nerves and muscles, how necessary if impaired that it should be strengthened both surely and with the least delay.

Have you not speculated with DRUG TREATMENT long enough? Why not try the private infirmary system, combining the best of all, for a while? Your life hangs upon your decision. Old Dr. Sweet has called to his aid in providing for his multitude of patients,—a proof of his unparalleled success in Springfield, DR. EDWARD RAY, a gentlemen of rare culture and medical attainments, a graduate of Harvard University, with extensive clinical and hospital experience, who has been given charge of the Surgical Department of Dr. Sweet's Sanitarium for the coming season.

This institution is now open to receive applicants for treatment under the famous Sweet Method, providing them with rooms and board at very low rates, with PERSONAL TREATMENT DAILY, or those who desire to visit the institution occasionally, yet live at home.

Persons of VERY limited means are thus enabled to receive the most scientific medical service provided by medical science to-day. The inhabitants of Western Massachusetts may be assured that Dr. Sweet will not rest content until he has provided for the people the MOST EFFICIENT systems of medical treatment extant. Whatever money or ingenuity can procure to make his institution THE FIRST in New England will be cheerfully provided. Success is the SINE QUENON. As his professional duties multiply—as they surely must—experts in the various branches of the "healing art" will be added to his staff. The best is none too good.

Pleased with the "City of Homes" as a permanent place of residence, Dr. Sweet has removed his family hither and indulges the hope that this fact will be appreciated by those wishing to avoid the uncertainty that attends the service offered by itinerant practitioners. Male and Female operators, assistants, nurses, etc., provided. Terms reasonable. Consultation, examination and advice free to the afflicted.

ACCIDENT DEPARTMENT. Athletes, Bicycle Riders and others suffering from sudden accident please take notice. Bring them here. Prompt service.

X RAYS IN PIRACY.

The pitiless pirate scanned the distant horizon with one of his eagle eyes.

"Hm!"

It was a short word, but there must have been a motive for it.

"A sail! A sail!"

Turning to his first mate, he commanded him, with a fearful oath, to run up the regulation flag.

That person replied that there wasn't one, as the only flag they ever had was shot away in the last affair.

Was the pirate chief rattled?

Nay!

For the bold buccaneer to rush down into his cabin, bring up his Roentgen camera, and by means of the X rays to take an instantaneous photograph of the mate's skull and of a couple of crossbones from his twisted leg was but the work of a moment, and in a wink the sable pennant was flying from the fore topsail of the saucy Plank-walker.

From that instant, as is usual in such cases, all was excitement.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

THE MOST POPULAR NOVELS.

From a comparison of the statistics of all the chief English libraries, says the Golden Penny, it is evident that there is a very general agreement that the best novels in the various departments of fiction are as follows:

Sensation novel—"The Woman in White."
Historical novel—"Ivanhoe."
Dramatic novel—"Monte Cristo."
Domestic novel—"The Vicer of Wakefield."
Sea novel—"Midshipman Easy."
Novel of rural life—"Adam Bede."
Political novel—"Lothair."
Novel written with a purpose—"Uncle Tom's Cabin."
Imaginative novel—"She."
Humorous novel—"Pickwick."
Irish novel—"Charles O'Malley."
Scotch novel—"Heart of Midlothian."
English novel—"Vanity Fair."
American novel—"The Scarlet Letter."
The most popular novel of all—"Vanity Fair."

A PIGEON TRAGEDY.—"I see that they are using carrier-pigeons quite extensively again." "Yes. Young fellow up in our neighborhood trained one to fly to his lady love's window. One day he tied a gushy mushy note around its neck and set it adrift. Pigeon flew down in a brewery yard and got full. Couple of bad boys came along and found the note on the disgraceful bird. Consequence is they've been blackmailing my poor friend for dimes ever since." "What became of the girl?" "Girl waited for pigeon delivery long past schedule time. Pigeon delivery didn't come. Girl got mad and engaged herself to 'nother fellow." "How about the pigeon?" Pigeon sticks to brewery. Can't drive him away with a barrel stave. Intoxicated most of time. Terrible object lesson for the sparrows. Too bad, isn't it?"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BY LINEAR MEASURE.—"Oh, yes," rejoined the Giraffe, blushing at the compliment, "I know I have a great deal of taste. I am built that way, don't you know! Yes." She explained in illustration, that it took the ice cream soda she was eating something like 25 seconds to reach its destination, and her relish was consequently indeed extensive.—Detroit Tribune.

Scott monument, an elegant gothic structure, costing, we are told, $80,000. Here I had the good fortune to meet Rev. Dr. G. L. Perrin of Boston, who was being piloted over the city by a friend, and upon making myself known was taken into the party and shown Edinburgh. Saw Holyroad castle, once the home of Lord Durnley and Queen Mary, and all the other points of interest. Went with Rev. Dr. Perrin to Sterling, the childhood home of Queen Mary; saw the old cathedral where she was first crowned and where James I was also crowned; the old castle, long the home of the Stuarts, and where the powerful Earl of Douglass was stabbed by King James, and was shown the window from which the king threw the body of the earl; saw also the field of Bannockburn, where Robert Bruce defeated Edward II and gave Scotland her freedom for a time. Then we went through the "Trossacks," as they are called, a series of Highland mountains, first by a four-horse team up a mountain as steep as the roof of a house, winding in and out among the ravines and down to Loch Katrine, where a little steamer took us around "Ellen's Isle" and by the "Strand," both made famous by Sir Walter Scott, past Ben Venue and other mountains. ("Ben" is Scotch for mountain). After a ride of about six miles on this beautiful Highland lake, another four-horse team and other mountains about as high, but not so steep, to Loch Lomond. Here another steamer to the southerly end of the Loch, past Ben Lomond and a great variety of highland scenery, and at night we reach Glasgow.

The following day we went about Glasgow and saw what we could, and at night Dr. Perrin left for Belfast. Since then I have finished the city more leisurely. Went to Ayr, the home of Burns; saw his birthplace, the "auld kirk," his monument, and the "banks and braes of Bonnie Doon," and Thursday will start for home.

If anyone has followed these rambles thus far a natural question would be: "What do you think of Great Britain?" and in reply will say that a hasty tour will only give surface impressions. However, I can safely say it is a rich, thrifty and beautiful country; on the whole progressive, but not very swift. Conservatism is very marked, a little too much so to really keep pace with the whirl of modern progress, but because of it the country has an added charm. They would not tear down the old South church or the state house; it would not require such a spasm to preserve historic monuments as with us. They show more piety. They may not be, and probably are not, more virtuous than we, but they show more of the devotional spirit and the spirit of reverence for sacred things. They have a place among the leading nations of the world to work out a higher and still better civilization.

STORY OF A WILDERNESS BATTLE-FIELD.

A strange story in which Seattle has an interest has come to light in connection with the battle of the Wilderness, through the desire of a small boy to get hold of a bird's nest. Henry F. Lowpenny, a corporal in the 32d Indiana volunteers, lost his right arm at the elbow during the battle by the explosion of a shell. Since then Lowpenny had died, but his widow resides in this city with a married daughter.

Bradley Johnson, a cousin of Lowpenny, and also ex-state chancellor of Missouri, now resides on the scene of the battle, and a few weeks ago his little son, while bird's-nesting, discovered a nest built in a skeleton hand in the fork of a large maple tree. On one of the bony fingers was found a seal ring, which was recognized by Mr. Johnson as having belonged to Lowpenny.—Seattle Post Intelligencer.

A BORN DIPLOMAT.—Charley was caught napping on the porch of the summer resort. A pair of soft little hands covered his eyes, and a sweet voice commanded: "Guess who it is." Nothing very dreadful for Charley in this, you think; but then, you don't know that Charley was engaged to two girls, and, for the life of him, he couldn't decide which voice it was, which made it a very embarrassing situation for Charley. A wrong guess would lead to complications awful to think of. But a happy thought inspired Charley, and he announced: "It's the dearest, sweetest little girl in the whole world. "Oh, you lovely boy!" gurgled the satisfied one, as she removed her hands. And now Charley thinks of applying for a foreign ministry, feeling that his talents would be wasted in any other than a diplomatic field.—Puck.

A POOR LINE OF SAMPLES.—Bishop Dudley of Kentucky, good-humoredly tells this story of himself. He was traveling once, when he sat next a drummer, who bored him with a good deal of idle conversation. The bishop became very taciturn. Finally the drummer, mistaking him for a commercial traveler, asked:—

"What line of goods are you in?"

"Brains," replied the bishop, brusquely.

"You are!" retorted the man of the road. "Well, I must admit that you carry the smallest line of samples of any man I ever saw in the business."—York Mail and Express.

ANYTHING FOR A CHANGE.—They were gravely discussing hosiery out on the hotel piazza.

"Where are you going, Maudie?" said the fluffy haired little blonde with the blue tinsel belt.

Maudie paused in the doorway.

"I thought it was about time to change the subject," she said, and vanished.

A few moments later, as the solitary young man came up from the station, he observed that she had on a pair of lavender ones with a purple vine climbing up from the instep.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

HE WILL NEVER GET OVER IT.—"I saw something just now I can't get over," observed the financial editor, coming in with a preoccupied look on his face. "What is it?" queried the exchange editor. "The moon. Tra, la, la, la—" "'Mph!" grunted the exchange editor. "That's pretty smart, but you can't tell the difference between Henry Clay and a gormlet." "What's a gormlet?" asked the financial editor, suspiciously. "A thing the hens pick their teeth with. Lumtium-tum-tum! Too-ral-eye, too-ral-eye, too-ral-eye-day?"—Chicago Tribune.

When morning came the sky was clear, the sun bright and the birds sang joyously. The colored man who had taken care of my horse soon appeared, and after a bite to eat I started down the road in hopes to meet my host returning with his wife. A mile and a half from the cabin I found them both. Whether she had been struck down by a flash or her life beaten out by the storm I could not say. She lay beside a large rock at the roadside. In an awful darkness he had found her, but she was dead. He lay beside her, one arm covering her face, and in the center of his forehead was a blue-black hole, from which the blood slowly oozed. He had shot himself beside Mary's dead body.—Advocate.

WILLING TO WORK.—He was an unkempt-looking fellow, and he stopped at the suburban residence and asked for employment. It was spring, and the lady of the house was herself superintending the transplanting of the plants. The door of the greenhouse was open.

"Are you a gardener?" asked the woman.

"Ain't had much experience."

"Can you plant these bushes?"

"I'd hate to risk spoilin' 'em, ma'am"

"Then what can you do?"

"Well, ma'am, if you'll give me one o' your husband's cigars," he replied, meditatively, "I'll sit in the greenhouse an' smoke out the insects that's eatin' up the leaves o' them roses-bushes."—"Editor's Drawer," Harper's Magazine.

A LOVER'S COMPLAINT.—"I gave you that parrot as a birthday present, did I not, Matilda?" he asked. "Yes; but surely, Albert, you are not going to speak of your gift as if—" "It was young and speechless at the time?" "Yes," with an increasing wonder, "and it has never been out of this parlor." "There are no other young ladies in this house?" "No. "Then why, why when I kissed your picture in yonder album, while waiting for you, did that wretched bird assume your voice and say, 'Don't do that, Charlie, please don't?"—London Telegraph.

MARY AND JOHN.

There was a terrible thunder storm coming up, and a thunder storm among the mountains of Tennessee means much to the traveler over the narrow and winding roads, each one full of peril from falling rocks and rushing water. It was growing dusky, too, and in the gloom and the hurry to reach shelter I came near riding over a woman who was coming down the road at a run. She screamed out and jumped aside, and as she stood for a moment I called out:

"The storm will be here in ten minutes. Run for the house!"

For an instant I caught sight of a white face under a sunbonnet. The eyes were wild, the teeth set hard, and I thought of a maniac. It was only for an instant, and then a flash of lightning set the horse at a full gallop. He ran for half a mile as if frightened for his life, turned to the right and leaped a fence, and as he halted at the door of a cabin a voice shouted in my ear:

"Git down and come in! Ike will stable the hoss!"

The storm broke at that moment, and what with the wind, the rain, the red flashes and loud-rolling thunder, we could only sit and look at each for the first quarter of an hour. Then the storm lulled into a steady pour, accompanied by an occasional fierce gust, and I knew it would be daybreak before we saw the last of it.

The man placed provisions on the table and sat down to the board with me. He made a great effort to appear hospitable and cheerful, but I noticed that he was listening intently, as if for a voice or a step, and twice he rose up and went to the window. By and by I recollected of seeing the woman, and said:

"Is there a cabin within a mile or so of this down the road?"

"None fur nigh onto three," he replied. "Then God help the woman I met half a mile below as the storm was breaking!"

"A woman! Did she have on a sunbonnet?"

"Yes."

"And a dark dress?"

"Yes."

"That was Mary, my wife! She said she would, but I didn't believe it."

"Would what?"

He rose up and flung open the door to look out. A sheet of rain blew half way across the room, extinguishing the candle and leaving us in darkness, and the cabin rocked under the wind as if it would blow over. The man shut the door, relighted the candle, and, placing it at a window so that its light would shine down the road, he came over to me and said:

"Yes, that was my wife. We have been married two years. Yonder in the cradle sleeps our infant."

"And what possessed her to start out in this awful storm?"

"I did!" he exclaimed in an accusing voice. "We had a quarrel. But for me it would have been only a trifle. She was proud and haughty, though loving and affectionate, and, while I knew I was in the wrong, I was determined to humble her. An hour ago, when I demanded, with the bearing of a tyrant, that she retract certain statements, she calmly dressed herself and set out for a seven-mile walk to her father's."

"You must have been insane to let her go!"

"God forgive me, but I would not say one word to keep her! I didn't believe she would go, but when she went out, kissing the baby good-by, but having neither word nor look for me, I would not ask her to stay."

"And what are her chances in this storm?"

His face was deathly pale, and his voice trembled like a child's as he answered:

"I'm going to look for her, and I want you to mind the cabin and the child. The little one is a sound sleeper, and the storm will grow no worse."

Taking down his rifle he opened the door and dashed out into the storm, and I was left alone. For hours there was no break in the fury of the storm. For hours the child slept peacefully through all the turmoil.

A good motto this for either individuals or communities, and readily finds echo in the voice of every merchant in Monson. Every dollar spent in your home stores adds to the development of the home industries—it helps the growth of the town by helping the growth of the individual, for we are all more or less depending upon each other.

The great trade centers pay tribute to the big stock. We are keeping careful track of your wants and constantly adding to the stock to meet them. We will open early in October two or three extra departments.

The Age of Perfection.

O, worshippers of womanhood,
No more old shibboleths repeat
(Youthful hyperbole, and crude!)—
Their fulsome praise is now effete;
But with a measured rapture greet,
Nor indiscriminately strive
To prove all women young and sweet—
The perfect age is 35.

Time was you praised the maiden's snood,
The timid eye, the lingering feet
In modest bashfulness that stood
Where rivulet and river meet,
Now childish grace is obsolete;
Our modern appetite would thrive
On riper grain, maturer wheat—
The perfect age is 35.

Tall Helen wandering in the wood,
And gentle Hermia, small and neat,
Young Rosalind in costume rude,
Girl-Juliet in your winding sheet,
You all alas, are incomplete;
Then pray that time may means contrive
Your changeless youthfulness to cheat—
The perfect age is 35.

Then woman, sober and discreet,
(So men may choose you when they wive),
The moment seize—for time is fleet—
The perfect age is 35.

THE DAWN OF REASON.

Some animals, exceedingly low in the scale of life, give evidences of the possession of a ratiocinative faculty, ay, of a reasoning faculty, the same in kind, though not in degree as that possessed by man. The following experiment, one that I have performed time and again, will demonstrate this. The natural habitat or dwelling place of æthalium, a minute microscopic animalcule of very low organization, is sawdust. If these creatures be taken from sawdust and placed in a watch crystal in which there is water, they will confine themselves to it; but if the glass be placed on sawdust they will leave it, crawling over its sides in order to get into more congenial—the sawdust. This shows conclusively that they recognize the dust through the transparent glass, and that they also remember and regard it as a more desirable home. Memory, conscious determination, and the fundamental principles of reason are, in this instance, clearly demonstrated. On one occasion, while examining a water louse through a large low-power lens, I saw it approach a polyp, gnaw off one of its buds, and then retreat to some distance, where it hid itself behind a particle of mud and proceeded to devour its victim. After a while it left its sheltering lump of mud and again swam to the polyp, which is immediately deprived of another of its young. It then swam back to the same little mud heap and there resumed its meal. This louse showed, in this instance, that it knew that the polyp was good for food; that it remembered the road to and from its source of food supply; and that to avoid interruption it hid itself while eating.

A wasp, of the variety commonly called "mud-dauber," last summer built her nest on the ceiling of my room in one corner. The windows of this room remained open night and day during the hot summer months, so her nest was easy of access. One day, while the wasp was busy about her home, I closed all of the windows and waited developments. At length she flew toward a window, against which she landed with a thump which for a moment or two completely dazed her. The wasp soon discovered that she was barred from the outer world by some transparent, translucent substance; she then proceeded on a voyage of discovery, flying around the room and searching here and there and everywhere for an exit. She finally found a small hole in the window casing which communicated with the ontside; through this she made her escape from the room. Upon opening the window I saw her examining the passage through which she had come, going through it repeatedly. She finally flew away, but shortly returned with a pellet of mud. Notwithstanding the fact that all of the windows were then open, the wasp went at once to the hole in the casing, through which she made her way into the room and thence to her nest on the ceiling. She never again, so far as I was able to ascertain, made an exit or an entrance through the windows, but always made use of the hole in the casing. This little creature undoubtedly gave unmistakable evidences of ratiocination; she found that a transparent barrier had been placed in her way—a barrier so translucent and transparent that she could not see it until she actually felt it. She therefore concluded that she would never again risk injury by flying through the windows. What is most remarkable about this instance is that this insect derived her knowledge from a single experience and at once profited thereby. All wasps, however, are not so intelligent as the one just mentioned, for it required several lessons to teach a ground wasp something similar. A ground wasp once built her nest beneath the brick pavement in front of my door. The entrance of the nest was situated in the little sulcus or ditch between the bricks. While the wasp was absent I stopped the entrance with a pellet of paper, and when the little housekeeper returned she was nonplussed for a moment or two, when she discovered that her doorway had been closed. The wasp, after examining the pellet of paper, seized it with her jaws and tried to pull it away; but since she stood on a brick and pulled backward (toward herself), the edge of the brick interposed and she could not dislodge the obstacle. Finally, the wasp got down into the little gully between the two bricks and pulled the pellet away from the opening of the nest without any further trouble. Three times I performed the experiment, the wasp going through like performances each time. At the fourth time, however, she went at once into the little space between the bricks and then removed the wad of paper without difficulty. I stopped the hole five or six times after this, but she had learned her lesson. She always got into the sulcus between the bricks before attempting to remove the paper. She had discovered the fact that she could not remove it when she stood on the surface of the bricks, owing to the interposition of their sides, and that she could drag it away if she got down into the little ditch and pulled the paper in a direction where nothing opposed.

Fleas have, comparatively speaking, highly developed minds. There are many people alive to-day probably who saw the trained fleas which were on exhibition in the large cities of the United States some thirty or forty years ago. These insects had been taught to go through certain evolutions at the command or signal of their owner and trainer. The mere fact that they possessed memory enough to learn, retain and remember their lessons is not proof positive of reason; but the fact of their having restrained their natural tendency and desire to escape when they could so easily gratify such a desire or tendency, is a potent factor in an argument for their possession of the ratiocinative faculty. Their teacher explained that he "brought them to reason" by keeping them at first in a glass vessel, where they jumped and bumped their heads to no purpose against the transparent walls of their prison. Thus their vaulting ambition was held in check and they learned to reason from cause and effect.

On one occasion I saw a flea show an evident gratification in a bit of malicious sport. I was observing a sleeping flea among the short hairs on a dog's leg, when another flea made her appearance beneath the lens. This flea soon discovered her sleeping sister, stopped short, and seemed to be in deep thought for a second or so. She then crept slowly up to within an inch of the recumbent flea, gave a little bound, and landed squarely upon her back. She clasped the astonished slumberer in her hind legs and proceeded to vigorously "touzle her hair" with her forelegs; then, springing to one side, she hurried away, closely pursued by the thoroughly aroused and evidently angry victim of her sport, and was soon lost to sight among the long hairs of the dog's back. I have seen like scenes time and again, in which human beings instead of fleas were the actors.

When we come to study the higher animals, evidences of their possession of reason crowd thick and fast upon us, and were I so minded, I could fill ream upon ream of paper with authentic anecdotes of their ratiocinative powers. I purpose, however, to give instances of ratiocination in animals that have occurred under my own observation or that have been witnessed by people whom I know and for whose probity and truthfulness I can vouch.

The ant is generally classed among the lower animals by observers, but a careful study of its cerebral anatomy and of its psychology leads me to place it among the higher animals, especially in point of mentality. When we take into consideration the fact that an ant's brain has gray matter analogous to the gray matter found in the cortex of the human brain, we should not feel surprised when we find striking evidences of ratiocination in these little creatures. The better creatures are able to communicate ideation or thought, the stronger and more frequent are the evidences of their possession of reason. Ants can undoubtedly communicate; how and in what manner, it is not generally agreed. Some time ago I crushed an ant in the path usually taken by the inhabitants of a nest (which was situated in a hollow tree) in their journeys to and fro. A soldier ant came along presently, and, smelling the blood of her murdered companion, was seized with a sudden terror and fled away into the nest. She soon returned, however, with thirteen other soldier ants, and made a careful examination of the body and its surroundings. Her companions also examined the corpse, and, having satisfied themselves that their companion was dead and that her murderer was not to be found, returned to the nest. Soon afterward a large worker ant, guarded by two soldier ants, came out, and, proceeding to the body, picked it up, carried it down the tree and away beneath the grass, where I lost sight of them. In this instance there is every evidence of complex reasoning; the discoverer of the murder hurried away into the nest, where she gave the alarm; the police of the community, the soldier ants, went immediately to the scene of the tragedy, made an examination, and then returned and gave in their report; the undertaker, in the shape of a large worker ant, then went out, got the body, carried it away and buried it; the two soldier ants followed the body to the grave, in order to protect it from cannibal ants.

It has been my good fortune to have witnessed several pitched battles between large bodies of ants. In a battle between some black ants and some yellow antagonists of another species, I saw many evidences of intelligent communication. The yellow ants had a commissariat and an ambulance corps, and I frequently saw them drop to the rear during the battle and partake of refreshments or have their wounds attended to. The blacks, which composed the attacking army, were in light marching order, and had neither of these conveniences and necessary adjuncts. The yellow ants frequently sent back to their village for reinforcements; those of them who had been out on hunting expeditions when the battle was joined were notified as soon as they arrived at the nest, and immediately hurried out to join in the fray. The blacks had discovered a herd of aphides belonging to the yellows, and had sought to surprise the guards and steal the herd; hence the battle. I am glad to report that the black horde was defeated by the brave yellow warriors and had to decamp, leaving many of its number dead upon the field of battle. On another occasion I saw an army of red ants besieging a colony of small black ants. The object of the red ants was the theft of the pupæ or young of the black ants. These pupæ they take to their own nest and rear as slaves, the enslaved ants to all appearances becoming entirely satisfied with their condition and working for their masters willingly and without demur. The besieged ants evinced a high degree of reason and forethought, for, as soon as the presence of the besiegers was noticed, strong guards were posted in all of the approaches to the nest, both front and rear. The red ants sent a detachment to surprise the colony from the rear, but they found that surprise was impossible, for they were met by a strong party of their gallant foes, which vigorously opposed them. The red ants were, however, eventually victorious and sacked the town, carrying away with them a large number of pupæ or young. I cheerfully bear witness to the fact that the great naturalist, Huber, was correct in his description of his experiment with these black slaves and their masters. Like Huber, I put some red ants into a glass jar in which I placed an abundance of food. Notwithstanding the fact that this food was of easy access, being, in fact, immediately beneath their jaws, they would not touch it. I then placed a black slave in the jar; she at once went to her masters, and, after thoroughly cleansing them with her tongue, gave them food, of which they ravenously partook. These red ants would have starved to death in the midst of plenty if they had been left to themselves. So utterly subservient had they become to the ministrations of their slaves that they had even lost the faculty of feeding themselves! Here we have an example of degeneration in the mentality of animals, incident to the enervating influence of slavery. Sir John Lubbock's remarks anent the four generations of slave-making ants are so interesting that I may be pardoned for introducing them.

Says he: "These four genera" [formica sanguinea, polyergus, strongylognathus, and anergates] "offer us every graduation from lawless violence to contemptible parasitism. Formica sanguinea, which may be assumed to have comparatively recently taken to slave-making, has not as yet been materially affected.

Polyergus, on the contrary, already illustrates the lowering tendency of slavery. They have lost their knowledge of art, their natural affection for their young, and even the instinct of feeding! They are, however, bold and powerful marauders.

"In strongylognatus the enervating influence of slavery has gone further, and told even on the bodily strength. They are no longer able to capture their slaves in fair and open warfare. Still, they retain a semblance of authority, and when aroused will fight bravely, though in vain.

"In anergates, finally, we come to the last scene of this sad history. We may safely conclude that in distant times their ancestors lived, as so many ants do now, partly by hunting, partly on honey; that by degrees

AMONG THE FAIRIES.

THE PRINCE'S BRIDE.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

[Copyright, 1896, by Walter B. Guild, Boston.]

CHAPTER I.

There was once a fairy prince whose realm was so vast that none of his subjects could travel beyond its boundaries. He was so truthful and brave, so loving and just, that when it became known that he would seek a bride among his subjects there was a great hurrying and flutter amid the beautiful maidens of the realm. They could not procure fine dresses quickly enough to satisfy their wishes.

The king issued a proclamation that read thus: "As I, the king, am about to place the crown upon the brow of my only son, the prince, it is meet and proper that he should choose for himself a bride, to be queen of all the realm. Such a one must be most beautiful of face, perfect of form, with a hand to fit the royal glove, feet to fit the royal slippers, and above all things, be loving and obedient. There will also be chosen for bridesmaids and ladies in waiting a numerous host, upon each of whom shall be bestowed rich gifts and great favor."

The royal glove and slipper were shown in each market place.

With this proclamation there was sent a number of rules by which one could fit herself to become the bride, a bridesmaid or a lady in waiting.

It was distinctly stated that the magical power of the prince could give to the oldest, the poorest, or the plainest, such graces as were demanded. In the matter of beauty, especially, the prince had set his own standard, and had said, "Only a good subject can ever become a good ruler, and one to truly love the king must love his kingdom and all of his royal subjects. All can strive for these honors, and those who wish to fulfill the requirements will be given full instructions at the market places of all the various hamlets and towns of the realm. The beauty of the inner life shall by magic power cause the face to shine. The old and the young shall all be as of one age and all of equal ability to meet the fullest measure of these my requirements. When great and true beauty is found within any house of my many subjects, then, upon my receiving knowledge of such treasure, I will call to see if the bride or a bridesmaid does dwell there, or, if, perchance, a lady in waiting is of such household."

The royal glove and the royal slipper were shown in each market place. They both were perfect in form.

The prince could make himself invisible and could also be in many places at the same time. His powers to disguise himself, or to been unseen while he himself could see in all directions and read the very thoughts of his subjects, made it impossible to deceive him or to successfully conspire against him.

All the maidens and all their friends were very loud in their professions of loyalty. The prince was very particular to command his subjects to be true-hearted and kind to each other. The people, however, were so proud of their prince and of their own many virtues that when any stranger, or even a friend, met with misfortune they would often forget to help the one afflicted, thus directly breaking the law of the king even while going to the market place to sing and shout the praises of their prince or to await his coming to choose a bride.

Now the prince was not in the least deceived by this show of loyalty, but decided that he would appear in different forms, in order to allow the maidens who were so very anxious to become his bride or to receive his favor to keep his best known law of love and kindness.

A new and special proclamation of this old law was sent out, and it was further stated that the perfect keeping of this one law would give perfect beauty. Those who truly love the king or the prince will love the poorest as well as the richest of his subjects, read the proclamation.

The captain of the king's host had seven daughters, all beautiful and fair to look upon. Olga, the eldest, was so fair as to dazzle the eyes of the young noblemen and officers of the royal guard, and so perfect in form and face that it was said by all that the prince would certainly choose her or one of the other daughters of the captain.

No other maidens in all the realm could be found so fair and graceful. Olga was surely more beautiful than the others, so it was a small matter to her what directions were given for becoming beautiful. Why trouble herself about them?

The prince had demanded love and obedience, but as she loved her father and family, loved herself especially and obeyed whenever it pleased her to do so, that matter was fully provided for with no further trouble. Humility was wanted, and this she did not quite understand, but when told that it was merely that one should not be foolishly proud and despise others while thinking too much of oneself she said: "Oh, yes. That is real nice. Why, I am proud of my humility, for surely I cannot think too highly of myself, and, as for others, why, I don't bother my head about them anyway. That is a sensible kind of humility for me."

You see, Olga was a proud and petted girl, and while thinking herself very wise was not so sensible as she pretended.

Now, in the captain's family was an old nurse who had for years helped others and had been kind to the poor and unfortunate. Her hands were rough and face wrinkled. Her breath was wheezy and her step lame and slow. Aunt Nancy, as she was called, was waiting for the king's messenger to come and take her to the home which the prince had provided for the old and weary.

This kingdom was different from others, and the old ladies' home, the orphan asylum,

PALMER NEWS.

A Much-Wanted Impostor Nabbed.

A slick impostor, whom the police of many cities have been looking after and who has slipped from their grasp many times, came to grief here Friday evening. For several years a man impersonating a Catholic priest has been at work in this state gathering money from Catholics for some religious purpose, and has been keeping it for his own private use. About a year ago he made his appearance in Fitchburg and worked several prominent Catholics in that city. He escaped the police, but descriptions of the man were sent to all police headquarters in the country and his movements were closely followed. The Fitchburg police several times had almost brought him to bay, when he would elude their grasp. Last Friday Deputy Sheriff O. W. Studley learned that he was in this vicinity; was seen in Springfield and had taken the train for this town. Officer Studley set out on a quiet hunt for this clever rascal, and about 11 o'clock Friday evening located him in the Nassowanno House and placed him under arrest. The bogus priest, or Thomas Lawrence, which is his real name, realized that his game was up and refused to have the handcuffs placed upon his wrists, but Officer Studley thought it would be best to have them on, and after a short struggle succeeded in carrying his point, as usual. He was taken to the lock-up, where he was searched. A priest's certificate was found upon his person. The Fitchburg authorities were notified and Chief of Police F. A. Tarbell arrived Saturday morning, and after looking at the man said that he was the one wanted. He was taken to Fitchburg on the 11 45 train. While in Palmer he visited two prominent Catholics and secured from them a small sum of money without exciting their suspicions in the least. His arrest probably saved several others from loss. He was arraigned in court at Fitchburg Monday and pleaded guilty to six counts, four for impersonating a priest, one for larceny of money, and one for larceny of a priest's certificate. He was bound over to the superior court held in Worcester next month in the sum of $3000. Officer Studley deserves much credit for checking the career of such a slick and unprincipled scamp.

Republican Caucus.

The Republicans held a caucus at the town house last evening, which was largely attended. Hon. C. L. Gardner was elected chairman. Before proceeding to business he made quite a lengthy speech, during which he was frequently interrupted by applause. F. A. Upham was elected secretary. The polls were then thrown open and voting commenced. In all 103 votes were cast, which is quite a contrast to the scattering 13 polled by the silver men. It was voted to support Roger Wolcott for governor, W. Murray Crane for lieutenant-governor, and W. H. Brainerd for county commissioner. These delegates were chosen: State, C. H. Hobbs, E. R. Pierce, Charles S. Ruggles, E. G. Childs; congressional, W. H. Brainard, F. A. Upham, G. M. Atkins, H. N. Sedgwick; councilor, Dr. W. H. Bliss, E. G. Hastings, L. E. Chandler, John O. Next Week's Cattle Show.

All signs point to a successful fair of the Eastern Hampden Agricultural society next Tuesday and Wednesday, apparently the only thing needful being good weather, in which respect the society has been unfortunate for several years. The entries in all departments are coming in rapidly, and an excellent showing is assured, especially in the cattle and horse line. There will be between 30 and 40 yoke of oxen alone, a showing which few fairs in this vicinity attain. The trotting classes have filled well, and the entries include some well-known and fast horses, so that good contests are assured. Stage performances will be given each day for the amusement of the attendants, and will be interesting no doubt, as the peformers were seen by the management before engaging, and pronounced good. An interesting feature will be an exhibition of the new Duyrea motor wagon on the track on Tuesday. The hall will be in charge of F. D. Rogers of Monson, and it is expected that the display will be unusually good this year. Band concerts will be given each day.

Republicans to Have a Flag-Raising.

The Republican Club held an enthusiastic meeting in the Club rooms Tuesday evening. Good speeches were made by C. L. Gardner and Dr. Holbrook. It was voted to have a grand flag-raising to-morrow evening at 7 o'clock. The new pole has already been set at the corner of Central and Main streets, opposite the old pole. A number of sound money men took hold of the pole and with their united strength soon placed it in position in the same way in which they will help to put McKinley in position next November with their ballots.

A platform will be erected near the Flynt Building and Construction Company's office from which speeches will be made. Michael J. Murray of Boston, manager of the W. Murray Crane campaign, will be the principal speaker; remarks will also be made by several local speakers. The Columbia Band of Thorndike has been engaged to furnish music. All republicans from all parts of the town are invited to be present and help make the affair a success.

Brakeman Hurt.

Henry Fisher, brakeman on the switcher in the New London Northern freight yard, had a narrow escape from death Monday morning, and as it is, he is seriously hurt. He was sitting upon a brake on one of the cars when the brake beam broke and he was thrown to the ground. He fell on the track between two cars and was pushed along for several feet by the moving train, but luckily the wheels did not pass over him. He was attended by Dr. J. Schneider. No bones were broken, but his body was badly bruised and it is feared that he is injured internally.

The Dorcas department of St. Paul's Union will meet next Tuesday afternoon in the chapel at 2.30, instead of Wednesday afternoon, as was announced at the last meeting.

A dog which showed symptoms of hydrophobia terrified the inhabitants at Shearer's corner one day last week until his career was ended by a gun in the hands of J. W. Goss.

S., where he was for some time assistant pastor. He succeeds Rev. D. A. Steele, D. D., who has been pastor there for over 27 years.

A. Q. Scammon's "Side-Tracked" will appear at the opera house next Tuesday evening. The company appeared here last season and gave a good performance, which was well received by the public. The show this season is as good as ever, and will be well presented. Tickets go on sale at Allen's drug store to-morrow morning at 9. Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents.

Mrs. Mary B., 75, widow of the late Horace Smith, died at her home near Palmer Center last Friday evening. The cause of her death was dropsy, though she has not been in good health since the death of Mr. Smith a few months ago. She leaves a son, three daughters and many friends to mourn her loss. The funeral was held from her late residence at two o'clock Sunday afternoon. Rev. H. F. Moulton officiated.

At the epileptic hospital grounds the administration building and one of the cottages have been roofed over. The contract for the lathing has been taken by Mr. Bryant of Springfield, and a metal lath will be used. The plumbing is being done by T. N. Tucker, the heating by A. B. Franklin and the electrical work by L. W. Fuller, all of Boston. H. E. Sisk has resigned his position as bookkeeper with Contractor Dodge, and is succeeded by Mr. Moulton of Springfield.

The second day of the cattle show will be fittingly wound up by a grand ball in the opera house, given by the Palmer Quintette. Music will be furnished by the Palmer Orchestra, and Prof. F. J. Guertin will prompt. A. J. Adams will have charge of the floor, with F. J. Roche, E. D. Tufts, D. E. O'Connor and W. J. Nolan as assistants. A fine programme of dances has been arranged, and every effort has been made to have all who attend have an enjoyable time.

Rev. H. F. Moulton will, next Sunday evening at 7.30, give a lecture on "Some hard sayings explained: (1) If thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell into the fire that never shall be quenched; where the worm dieth not. (2) It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." This will be the first of a series of lectures to be given during the fall and winter on "Bible Threatenings Explained."

Palmer has always been well represented in the higher institutions of learning by its young people. This year several more have entered college. The following have already left for their respective schools: Harold Shaw, Ned Gardner and Ralph LeGro to Amherst; Miss Bessie Royce to Tilton Seminary, Tilton, N. H.; Miss Bertha Royce to Dean Academy, Franklin, Mass.; Miss Ola Northrop to Mt. Holyoke college; Miss Clara Smith to Wilbraham Academy; Miss Carrie Tuthill to Brown University, Providence, R. I.; Miss Bertha Hastings and Miss Phoebe Hastings to Smith College.

Palmer is to have a boom in real estate. P. B. Moore, formerly of Monson, now a real estate agent of Hartford, Ct., has bought the Smith lot above the Point of Rocks and has divided the same into 20 building lots which he will sell at auction Saturday, September 26, at 2 p. m. These are desirable lots on which to erect a home, and are in a good location. To draw people to the place of sale five souvenirs are to be given away; two gold watches,—lady's and gentleman's,—a ten-dollar gold piece, five silver dollars, and a barrel of flour. Tickets will be given to all attending the sale, giving them a chance to draw one of the souvenir.

If people on Main street see a number of men dressed in army blue, with guns and military equipments dash through the street on bicycles at good speed to-morrow afternoon they need not be alarmed and think some enemy is advancing against this town, but just remember that it is the Springfield City Guard's military road race against time. The start is to be made in Springfield, and part of the run is through Palmer to the burned mill at North Monson and return the same way. They leave Springfield at 2.30 p. m, and if the start is made on time they will probably go through here about 3.30. Each man is to be in uniform, with gun and other equipments. This race is held as a trial to see what time they could make in case they should be called upon to meet some advancing foe or supress some revolt outside the city of Springfield.

The many Palmer friends of Miss E. M. Fullington, formerly of the State Primary School, will be interested in the following item from the Hyde Park, Vt., News and Citizen of August 20th.

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at the residence of B. S. Fullington on Wednesday evening of last week, which united in marriage Miss Eugenia M. Fullington of East Cambridge and Mr. Daniel W. Green of Ligonier, Indiana. The large house of Mr. Fullington was artistically decorated with sweet peas, ferns and clematis, which added much to the beauty of the occasion. Rev. Edwin Wheelock of Cambridge performed the ceremony in the presence of only the near relatives of the bride. Miss Fullington has been for many years principal of the schools at the State Primary School at Palmer, Mass., and is a lady of high culture and refinement. Mr. Green is a very successful lawyer, a gentleman of high position in Ligonier, and the bride's many Johnson friends extend to him their happy congratulations, and wish both him and Mrs. Green every joy in their union.

In spite of the reported opposition in some sections to the renomination of W. H. Brainerd for county commissioner, he seems to have secured a goodly number of delegates, many of the caucuses held yesterday and Wednesday instructing the delegates to vote for Mr. Brainerd. After all, there was no real good reason why he should not have a renomination. About the only thing which could be brought up against him was the dissatisfaction in some localities over the representative redistricting, because the districts were not finally laid out to suit everybody. It was a natural consequence of the redistricting that the county commissioner who came up for reelection that year would be knifed more or less, and it is Mr. Brainerd's misfortune to be the victim. The indications, however, do not point to any extensive dissatisfaction, and his nomination is confidently looked for by his friends.

An Appeal.

Editor of the Palmer Journal:—May I make an appeal through the columns of your paper for the support of a worthy object in which the public is interested? The clock in the tower of St. Paul's church, when in good running order, is a benefit to our whole village. I understand that many of our citizens helped somewhat, in one way and another, to obtain it. During the last two years the clock has had quite extensive repairs, and for all that can be seen is now in good condition. Several have said to me and to others that the clock is of public use. St. Paul's parish ought not to pay for all of the repairs; also, there ought to be public spirit enough in this place to help in a practical way by the giving of a few dollars. Now, I believe there is enough of this public spirit, therefore, I would like, with the help of one or two persons, to raise a sum of money,—fifty dollars or more,—for defraying the expense of repairing and maintaining the clock. I hope and I believe that there are many in our village, who will with cheerfulness respond to this appeal. If you will mail or hand to me any sum for this purpose it will be duly acknowledged. I hope, however, that a subscription paper may soon be started for this purpose. If it is, gladly welcome it. Hoping that this appeal may meet with entire sympathy, promptness and favor,

I remain, very fraternally,
HERBERT F. MOULTON.

Palmer, Sept. 16, 1896.

District Court.

Special Justice McFarland of Wales presided Tuesday morning. Bert Lamb of Monson appeared before him charged with assault, and was assessed $16. In the afternoon Mrs. Mary B. Bell of Three Rivers was arraigned for selling property which did not belong to her, W. R. Milligan being the complainant. Lawyer Leach appeared for the defendant and Lawyer H. C. Strong for the complainant. The case was quite complicated, and the many tilts between the opposing lawyers made it interesting and amusing to the spectators. Judgment was found for the defendant.

Wares 7, Bondsvilles 5.

It took three umpires for the game at Bondsville Saturday afternoon, and then both sides thought they were being cheated. The first two men who essayed to preside over the game caused considerable kicking over their decisions, and in the third inning they were given their releases. Donahue, who succeeded them, gave satisfaction to both sides. Ware was victorious. Sheehan, late of the Southern League, did the twirling for Bondsville. He had speed "to burn," and struck out 12 men. He was ably supported behind the bat by McCarthy of Florence. Davis pitched good ball for Ware, striking out 10 man and keeping the 8 hits well scattered. Ryan, Moriarty, Nelson and Keye did the hitting for Bondsville, while Harrison and Rogers excelled for Ware. The score:

The baseball season is practically ended, so far as games in town are concerned. Manager Sugrue has had a successful season, and the public have been given the pleasure of witnessing some very close and exciting games. The telephone service, which for some time has been poor, has finally so aroused the ire of the subscribers that complaints have been entered by a number, and the company has promised to remedy the trouble. Meantime the buzzing, cracking and pounding can be heard more than 10 feet away from the instruments. To say that "communication is interrupted," as the contract puts it, is to draw it mild. The noise in one's ear causes the ear to feel as though it was as big as a wash-tub. As the contract states that rent will be abated after twenty-four hours from the time complaint is made in regard to "interrupted communication," some subscribers have signified their unwillingness to pay rent until the service is satisfactory.

An Enjoyable Entertainment by Home Talent.

An unusually enjoyable entertainment was given at the town hall Tuesday to a large and appreciative audience. The programme was mainly a musical one, the recitations given by Miss Andrews having musical accompaniments. The entertainment was given wholly by home talent, including those who spend part of the year in Brimfield. It had added interest on this account, while at the same time the performance was of a high order of merit in itself. The selections were happily made and the audience was a very responsive one. The programme was as follows:

Piano Duet,	Spanish Dances
	Misses Stoughton and Hitchcock.
Vocal Selections,	"There Little Girl, Don't Cry."
	"My Lover Was a Weaver."
	Miss Hitchcock.
Banjo Solo,	Normandy March
	Mr. Hall.
Recitation,	"The Country Sleighride."
	Miss Andrews.
Song,	"Answer"
	Mr. Peirce.
Piano Selections,	Wedding March, Lohengrin
	Mendelssohn's Wedding March
	Miss Warren.
Recitation,	"Palestine."
	Miss Andrews.
Selections from Banjo and Guitar.
	Mr. Hall and Mr. Peirce.
Song,	"Birds of Spring."
	Miss Hitchcock.
Exercises in Dramatic Expression,
	Miss Andrews.
Song,	"Twilight Land."
	Mr. Peirce.

Mr. Hall, the new assistant teacher in the high school, plays the piano and the banjo, and his contribution to the entertainment was much appreciated by those who prepared the programme. His banjo playing won the heartiest applause of the evening. The duets for banjo and guiter by Mr. Hall and Mr. Pierce, members of Tufts College banjo and mandolin club, were finely rendered and heartily enjoyed.

It is a long time since Miss Warren, formerly a teacher of music in the Hitchcock Free High School, has been heard in Brimfield. The anticipations of those who recalled the enjoyment which her rare touch and expression always gave, were more than fulfilled by her playing of the well-known wedding marches. The piano duet, consisting of two of Moszkowski's Spanish dances, was well adapted for the opening number of the entertainment, and was much liked by the audience. Miss Hitchcock sang for the first time since her return from Chicago, where she has been studying for the past year under Frederick Root. She has a high, sweet soprano voice, and sang with fine expression and much charm of manner. Mr. Pierce is taking a musical course in Tufts College in addition to his other studies, and has recently been made leader of the college glee club He has a fine baritone voice and sang exceedingly well. Miss Andrews received much merited praise. Especial mention should be made of the exercise in dramatic expression, which is not often excelled. It was a matter of regret that Mrs. Pierce's rich contralto could not have been heard in a special number. She was unable to do more than serve most acceptably as piano accompanist, with the exception of the song accompaniment, which she rendered with exquisite effect, to the selection "Palestine," given by Miss Andrews. Mrs. Kyle, whose name was down on the programme and whose singing is much enjoyed, was unable to take part in the entertainment. All of the performers was presented with handsome bouquets. The stage was beautifully decorated with cut flowers, potted plants, clematis and golden-rod. The decorations were in charge of Mrs. F. D. Lincoln.

A large share of the audience remained for a social time after the entertainment, and ice cream was served. A great acquisition to the announcement of what proved in every respect a most successful affair was a much admired poster designed by Miss Stoughton of New York, a student at the Art League.

There is to be an interesting temperance concert at the East Congregational church next Sunday evening, under the management of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Some new features never before seen in town will be introduced.

The services at the East Congregational church last Sunday morning were of more than usual interest, Rev. A. B. Bassett being at his best, speaking from the text Romans 12:1 "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." The enjoyment of the service was greatly heightened by the newly organized choir, composed principally of 14 young ladies, who sang with the spirit and understanding. The floral display was very fine, composed of asters and salvia.

LOOKS LIKE COFFEE

But Made of Nature's Pure Grains.—A Pure Food.

The ancient Germans were a sturdy race, and history records that they were great users of grains in their daily food.

Persons who stick to a plentiful diet of grains, bread, meat and fruits are reasonably sure to keep well. Much butter or sweets should be avoided, as the starch of the food is turned to sugar and finally to fat. Tea and coffee make themselves felt with thousands of Americans the present day. They delay digestion, as shown in late experiments, and this fact explains the cause of the serious disorders which frequently come to old and steady tea and coffee drinkers.

A new drink, called "Postum Cereal," has lately been produced by careful preparation of the grains, and it possesses the important elements of being a fac-simile in looks of the finest Mocha coffee, has a rich, pungent flavor, and is easily digested by the weakest stomachs. It is a nourishing food drink of the most perfect character, and is quickly taken into the system and into the circulation. The makers claim that "it makes red blood," and results justify the claim. It is especially good for the production of clear skin, through which the coursing red blood can be seen in pink and ruddy flashes, producing that charming complexion so much admired in the thoroughly healthy woman or man.

"Postum" can be used by the children as well as the adults, and the chicks become very fond of their "coffee." Being composed of grains alone, it is absolutely pure and healthful, a natural food drink, and is made by the Postum Cereal Co. Lim., of Battle Creek, Mich.

There is but one genuine original Postum Cereal coffee, with a multitude of imitations offered as "just as good."

Your Boy Wont Live a Month.

So Mr. Gilman Brown, of 34 Mill street, South Gardner, Mass., was told by the doctors. His son had Lung trouble, following Typhoid Malaria, and he spent three hundred and seventy-five dollars with doctors, who finally gave him up, saying: "Your boy won't live a month." He tried Dr. King's New Discovery and a few bottles restored him to health and enabled him to go to work a perfectly well man. He says he owes his present good health to the use of Dr. King's New Discovery, and knows it to be the best in the world for Lung trouble. Trial bottles Free of LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. White Mountain Excursion.

Attired in garments of the most beautiful hues, the majestic Mountain ranges of Northern New Hampshire bids welcome to visitors. Vast is the territory, and numerous are the paths comprising the famous White Mountains, but at every turn will be found bewildering and marvellously interesting features which will, because of the peculiar make up, demand more than a casual observation.

Gradually has the mountain season been prolonged, and September and October are now considered ideal months in which to visit this ideal region.

During the period from now until October 10th, the Boston and Maine Railroad will place on sale at all the principal stations on the system reduced rate round trip tickets to the leading mountain resorts. These tickets are good for stops over only at points north of North Conway or Plymouth.

Reduced rates will be given to holders of these tickets at the leading mountain resorts.

Side-trip tickets to various points of interest will be on sale at Fabyans and Bethlehem Junction, and any information regarding these excursions can be obtained at the principal ticket offices on the Boston and Maine line, and also at the City Ticket Office, 322 Washington St, corner of Milk St.

Always in season, Hopkins' Steamed Hominy (Hulled Corn). Elegant lunch in milk. Qt. can, 10c.

Sent it to His Mother in Germany.

Mr. Jacob Esbensen, who is in the employ of the Chicago Lumber Co., at Des Moines, Iowa, says: "I have just sent some medicine back to my mother in the old country, that I knew from personal use to be the best medicine in the world for rheumatism, having used it in my family for several years. It is called Chamberlain's Pain Balm. It always does the work." 50 cent bottles for sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

In a recent letter to the manufacturers Mr. W. F. Benjamin, editor of the Spectator, Rushford, N. Y., says: "It may be a pleasure for you to know the high esteem in which Chamberlain's medicines are held by the people of your own state, where they must be best known. An aunt of mine, who resides at Dexter, Iowa, was about to visit me a few years since, and before leaving home wrote me, asking if they were sold here, stating if they were not she would bring a quantity with her, as she did not like to be without them." The medicines referred to are Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, famous for its cure of colds and croup; Chamberlain's Pain Balm for rheumatism, lame back, pains in the side; and Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy for bowel complaints. These medicines have been in constant use in Iowa for almost a quarter of a century. The people have learned that they are articles of great worth and merit, and unequaled by any other. They are for sale here by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

From all accounts Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is a Godsend to the afflicted. There is no advertisement about this; we feel just like saying it.—The Democratic, Carrollton, Ky. For sale by LeGro & Lynde, Palmer; G. L. Keeney, Monson; F. A. Spencer, Ware.

AUCTION SILKS.

Some people think that everything from auction is trash, and not without reason. They have seen so much of it. We look out for that; have no use for trash and pass it by. The silks that we have from auction are new perfect goods such as anybody would be glad to buy.
